effect on these critically important health care providers, their employees, and their patients across rural America. In my home State of Iowa, where 4 rural hospitals have closed in the last 6 years, and where a quarter of rural hospitals are now operating at a loss, the Franklin General Hospital in Hampton, IA, announced last year that it would have to lay off 25 employees, 11 percent of their staff, effective immediately due to the anticipated cutbacks in Medicare funding. If this program is not extended, the Van Buren County Hospital, a 40-bed acute care facility, will lose $149,000 next year, an amount equal to their entire bottom line last year. Francis T. Carr, administrator of the Eldora Regional Medical Center, told me that the $100,000 his hospital would lose if the Medicare Dependent Hospital Program ended would amount to 5 percent of its annual budget. Their only recourse would be raise taxes on county residents who are already bearing more than their fair share of health care costs, or to increase fees which would have the same effect, further fueling the spiraling cost of health care. Richard C. Hamilton, administrator of the Clarinda Municipal Hospital refers to the scheduled end of this program as "slow, constant financial strangulation."

Fifty-five small, rural Iowa hospitals are eligible for help under the MDH Program and 33 are being assisted by it. Expiration of the program could mean a loss of over $8.1 million a year for these hospitals. For some, that could well mean the end. And for thousands of Iowans, that would mean significantly reduced health care access.

Mr. President, the legislation I am reintroducing today also authorizes an expansion of the Rural Health Outreach Program that I worked to establish as a part of the fiscal year 1991 Labor, Health and Human Services appropriations bill. We began this innovative program to demonstrate the effectiveness of outreach programs to populations in rural areas that do not normally seek or have trouble accessing health or mental health services. The outreach grants are designed to address two major needs: First, improved outreach efforts by community and migrant health centers, local health departments, and other providers to reach many people in need of primary and preventive care who now are not being reached until they are acutely ill and need extensive and expensive hospital care, and, second, improved cooperation between health and social service agencies in reaching these people. This program has received overwhelmingly positive response from around the Nation.

In the Outreach Grant Program's short history, it has already had a great impact on improving coordination between health care providers and expanding access to needed health and mental health services. Grants have been awarded now in all 50 States. In Iowa, the Grundy County Memorial Hospital in Grundy Center received funds to establish a hospice program to provide needed care to terminally ill individuals. Mahaska County Hospital in Oskaloosa, IA, received a grant to coordinate improved occupational health services to farm families and agribusiness employees in 15 southeastern Iowa counties. The residents of Monticello, IA, will benefit from improved access to preventive care as a result of a rural health outreach grant. Also, families of victims of Alzheimer's disease in three Iowa counties will be helped by the formation of support groups and community education programs supported by this program.

As chairman of the Labor-HHS Appropriations Subcommittee, I was pleased to be able to increase funding for this program to $24.8 million in fiscal year 1993. This legislation we are introducing today would authorize an expansion of the Outreach Grant Program to $50 million in fiscal year 1994 and such sums as necessary for fiscal years 1995 to 1998.

The Rural Health Care Protection and Improvement Act of 1993 would extend for 5 more years the Rural Health Transition Grant Program. The Transition Grant Program was to expire last year, but was extended for an additional year last year by language included in the fiscal year 1993 Labor, HHS appropriations bill.

This very successful program, established as a part of OBRA '87, helps small rural hospitals and their communities adapt to changing situations and needs. Situations such as excess hospital capacity and a declining supply of health professionals, increasing demand for ambulatory and emergency services, and the need for adequate access to emergency and inpatient care in areas where many underutilized hospital beds are being eliminated. Eligible hospitals receive grants of up to $50,000 a year for up to 3 years. In 1991, 188 hospitals in 44 States received grants under this program. Under this legislation, authorization of the Transition Grant Program from $25 to $30 million a year and extends its authorization through 1998.

Iowa has been particularly helped by the Transition Grant Program. It has consistently ranked among the top States in the number of hospitals receiving grants under the program. Among Iowa hospitals receiving new grant awards last year were the Winneshiek County Memorial in Decorah, Anamosa Community Hospital in Anamosa, Virginia Gay Hospital in Vinton, Grundy County in Grundy Center, Veterans Memorial in Waukon, Mercy in Corning, Van Buren County in Keosauqua, Story County in Nevada, Cass County Memorial in Atlantic, and Humboldt County Memorial in Humboldt.

Mr. President, rural Americans are at triple jeopardy—they are more often poor, more often uninsured, and more often without access to health care. They are at increased risk to motor vehicle injury and death with two-thirds of motor vehicle deaths occurring in rural areas. Over 12 million rural Americans also face the increased occupational risks of farming, America's most hazardous occupation. Rural America is home to a disproportionately large segment of older citizens who more often require long-term care for their illnesses and disabilities. And rural America is not immune from the social stresses of modern society. This is manifest by escalating needs for mental health services to deal with necessary alcohol- and drug-related treatment, and by the significantly higher rate of suicide in rural areas. Yet, rural Americans are increasingly becoming commuters for their health care. Rural Americans deserve to be treated equitably and this legislation takes several meaningful first steps toward assuring that quality health care is readily accessible to them.

Mr. President, while this bill is an important step toward improving health care for rural Americans, it is time for comprehensive health care reform in America that assures every American affordable, quality health care. This reform must recognize that affordable insurance is not of much help if there are no hospitals, doctors, nurses, and other health care professionals to provide needed care. It must also recognize that until we do a much better job at keeping people healthy and preventing disease and disability, we will never have a truly effective health care system. And our reforms must also protect Americans against what is for many the most devastating of costs and inhibiting to families—long-term care and personal assistance services. A need that is particularly great in rural areas because of higher elderly populations.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join us in supporting this important legislation and ask unanimous consent that a copy and summary of the proposed bill be printed in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF S. 97, THE RURAL HEALTH CARE PROTECTION AND IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1993

This legislation would preserve and expand three programs that are critical to maintaining and improving access to health care in hundreds of rural communities across the nation. The "Rural Health Care Protection and Improvement Act of 1993":

Extends the special Medicare-Dependent Small Rural Hospital payment provisions for 3 years, when the urban-rural payment differential is set to be fully phased out.

Keeps the Rural Health Transition Grant Program alive by extending its authorization, set to expire this year, for five more years and increasing its authorization level from $25 million to $30 million a year.

Authorizes an expansion of the Rural Health Outreach grant program that was created in the Fiscal Year 1991 Labor, Health and Human Services Appropriations bill.

MEDICARE DEPENDENT HOSPITAL PROGRAM

Established in OBRA '89, this program provides a measure of relief to rural hospitals with 100 or fewer beds that are dependent upon Medicare for at least 60 percent of their patient days and do not qualify as sole community hospitals (SCHs). These hospitals are eligible for the same payment rules available to SCHs which allow them to receive hospital-specific rates higher than they would normally receive under PPS. 21 percent of rural hospitals are designated as Medicare Dependent Hospitals (MDHs) and 45 percent of MDHs receive higher Medicare payments because of this status. For those 243 hospitals, the average increase in Medicare payments is 17 percent over what they would otherwise be receiving.

Under current law the program ends with hospital cost reporting periods ending March 31, 1993. Many hospitals under the program have already lost assistance. This legislation extends the MDH program for an additional three years, providing strapped rural hospitals much needed relief until the urban/rural differential in Medicare payments is set to be phased out. Its provisions are retroactive until January 1, 1992 in order to assure that no hospital is penalized by the failure to enact the extension last year.

RURAL HEALTH TRANSITION GRANT PROGRAM

This very successful program, established as a part of OBRA '87, helps small rural hospitals and their communities adapt to changing situations and needs. Situations such as excess hospital capacity and a declining supply of health professionals, increasing demand for ambulatory and emergency services, and the need for adequate access to emergency and inpatient care in areas where many underutilized hospital beds are being eliminated. Eligible hospitals receive grants of up to $50,000 a year for up to 3 years. In 1991, 188 hospitals in 44 states received grants under this program. Fiscal year 1993 funding is $22.8 million.

Authorization for the transition grants expired in 1992 but was extended through the fiscal year 1993 Labor, Health and Human Services Appropriations act, this legislation would extend the program until 1997 and increase the authorization from $25 million to $30 million a year.

RURAL HEALTH OUTREACH PROGRAM

The FY'91 Labor, Health and Human Services Appropriations Act began this initiative to demonstrate the effectiveness of outreach programs to populations in rural areas that do not normally seek or have trouble accessing health or mental health services. The outreach grants, which have proven to be in great demand, are designed to address two major needs: 1) improved outreach efforts by community and migrant health centers, local health departments and other providers to reach many people in need of primary and preventive care who now are not being reached until they are acutely ill and need extensive and expensive hospital care, and, 2) improved cooperation between health and social service agencies in reaching these people. $24.8 million in rural outreach grants will be awarded to communities throughout the nation in fiscal year 1993.

This legislation would authorize an expansion of the outreach grant program to $50 million in 1994 and such sums as necessary for fiscal years 1995-1998.

By Mr. BRADLEY:

S. 98. A bill to establish a Link-Up for Learning grant program to provide coordinated services to at-risk youth; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

LINK-UP FOR LEARNING GRANT ACT

• Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, the poverty, hunger, illness, and family breakdown that is the tragic condition of too many American children has placed tremendous stresses on our educational system. When we look at the failures of American education, at declining test scores, at the difficulty businesses have in finding young workers with basic skills, we have to face up to the fact that many youngsters come to school unready to learn.

An empty stomach, pregnancy, homelessness, chronic illness, sleepless nights spent listening to a domestic fight in the next room or a gunfight in the street can make it impossible to focus the mind on reading, spelling, and multiplication tables. America's teachers know this, and they work hard to help each student overcome the barriers to learning. In any circumstance, this is a daunting proposition. But with class sizes of 30 students or more, inadequate facilities and stressful classroom settings, this can be a nearly impossible task. The Link-Up for Learning Act will help schools, families, and teachers connect students with the social services that will help them come to school ready to learn.

Link-Up for Learning recognizes that in every region of the country, services for children are available from many private and local government agencies.

But too often neither parents nor teachers are aware of all the possibilities, so children's needs go unmet. Bringing together families, teachers, school personnel, and community social service providers will make it possible to see all of a child's needs so that all the adults involved can work together to help that child reach his or her fullest potential.

There is no single model for connecting schools, families, and social service providers. The Link-Up for Learning bill, by establishing a $100 million grant program in the Department of Education, will help various localities explore what works to meet the learning needs of at-risk kids in their schools. The common thread to all the projects will be that the districts must already be eligible to receive chapter I funds for disadvantaged students.

I expect that some of the projects funded will draw on New Jersey's School Based Youth Services Programs [SBYSP], which offer one of the most successful models for connecting schools with social services. The 29 centers established by this program offer a one-stop approach for students or dropouts between the ages of 13 and 19 who want an opportunity to complete their education or obtain other services. Many new projects will look at other ways to make the whole array of social services available to a particular young person or family.

Other programs, I expect, will link educational programs designed to address or prevent a particular problem with community-based programs in the same area. The healthy mothers/healthy babies initiative underway in 10 New Jersey cities offers a good example of this approach. Schools, prenatal care providers, social service agencies, and community and church groups work together to educate young mothers and to keep both mother and infant healthy. A successful program can help the mother complete her schooling and help her child grow up ready to learn, thus preventing two human tragedies.

I mention these models only as examples of how connecting schools, families, and community resources can help save children. The purpose of this bill is to unleash the creativity in our schools and communities to come up with new and better ways to make this connection.

Before closing, I need to acknowledge the enormous contribution made by the nation's school boards and their national association to this effort. These community-minded individuals have always been at the forefront of creating an effective school program. Their development and support for this Link-Up for Learning is proof of their commitment, and I thank them for it.

Mr. President, if we fail to educate the children who are poor in America today, we will consign one in five Americans to a future of failure and low productivity. The millions of children who are victims of abuse and neglect each year, the 100,000 who are homeless, the millions who come from single-parent families bring enormous new problems to our schools. Teachers know that if they can find a way to address these problems, the process of learning can begin and succeed. Link-Up for Learning will help those kids find a way out of their problems so they can concentrate on learning and achieving the full potential of their minds and bodies.

I ask unanimous consent that a brief summary and the text of the bill be printed following my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Link-up for Learning Grant Act".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

Congress finds that—

(1) growing numbers of children live in an environment of social and economic conditions that greatly increase the risk of academic failure when such children become students;

(2) more than 20 percent of the Nation's children live in poverty while at the same time the Nation's infrastructure of social support for such children has greatly eroded, for example, 40 percent of eligible children do not receive free or reduced price lunches or benefit from food stamps, 25 percent of such children are not covered by health insurance, and only 20 percent of such children are accommodated in public housing;

(3) many at-risk students suffer the effects of inadequate nutrition and health care, overcrowded and unsafe living conditions and homelessness, family and gang violence, substance abuse, sexual abuse, child abuse, involuntary migration, and limited English proficiency that often create severe barriers to learning the knowledge and skills needed to become literate, independent, and productive citizens;

(4) almost half of all children and youth live in a single parent family for some period of their lives, resulting in greatly reduced parental involvement in their education;

(5) high proportions of disadvantaged and minority children live with never married mothers or teenage mothers who have extremely limited resources available for early childhood development and education;

(6) large numbers of children and youth are recent immigrants or children of recent immigrants with limited English proficiency and significant unmet educational needs;

(7) services for at-risk students are fragmented, expensive, overregulated, often ineffective and duplicative, and focused on narrow problems and not the needs of the whole child and family;

(8) school personnel and other support service providers often lack knowledge of and access to available services for at-risk students and their family in the community, are constrained by bureaucratic obstacles from providing the services most needed, and have few resources or incentives to coordinate services;

(9) service providers for at-risk students such as teachers, social workers, health care givers, juvenile justice workers and others are trained in separate institutions, practice in separate agencies, and pursue separate professional activities that provide little support for coordination and integration of services;

(10) coordination and integration of services for at-risk students emphasizing prevention and early intervention offers a great opportunity to break the cycle of poverty that leads to academic failure, teenage parenthood, leaving school, low skill levels, unemployment, and low income; and

(11) coordination of services is more cost effective for schools and support agencies because it reduces duplication, improves quality of services, and substitutes prevention for expensive crisis intervention.

BILL SUMMARY OF THE LINK-UP FOR LEARNING GRANT ACT

1. Purpose and Target Population: Growing numbers of children live in economic conditions that greatly increase their risk of academic failure when they enter school. The Link-Up for Learning Grant bill provides funds to coordinate educational and social support services for at-risk youth in our nation's elementary and secondary schools, and enhances the effectiveness of these services. The legislation targets educationally disadvantaged students and their families.

2. Eligibility and Authorized Uses of Funds: A Chapter One eligible school district collaborating with a public agency, a non-profit organization, an institution of higher education, or a Head Start agency may apply for a 3 year grant. Recipients may use funds to coordinate and improve access to school-based or community-based education support services for disadvantaged youngsters. Such services can include nutrition, health screening and referrals, counseling, substance abuse prevention, extended school day programs, tutoring, literacy, parent education and involvement, child abuse services, welfare services, juvenile delinquency, job training and placement and others. Funds may also be used to establish "one-stop shopping" locations for services in schools, community centers, public housing sites or other central locations, to facilitate interagency communication, design unified eligibility procedures, coordinate case management, and train staff across agencies.

3. Limitations and Applications: Special consideration in awarding grants is given to urban and rural areas with high proportions of at-risk students. Not more than one-third of each grant shall be used for planning a coordinated service program and not more than 50 percent of each grant shall be used for the delivery of services. The federal share of the cost of the activities shall be 50 percent.

4. Other Provisions: The bill establishes a Federal Interagency Task Force to facilitate interagency collaboration at the federal, state and local levels. Finally, it directs the Secretary of Education to conduct a study of funded projects and make recommendations to Congress to improve coordination of educational support services.

5. Authorized Appropriations: $100 million is authorized for grants in Fiscal Year 1994 and such sums as are necessary are authorized in Fiscal Years 1995 and 1996.●

By Mr. METZENBAUM (for himself, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. SIMON, and Mr. BROWN):

S. 99. A bill to amend the antitrust laws to provide a cause of action for persons injured in U.S. commerce by unfair foreign competition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

UNFAIR FOREIGN COMPETITION ACT

● Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I am introducing with my colleagues, CHARLES GRASSLEY, PAUL SIMON, and HANK BROWN, the International Fair Competition Act of 1993.

The act will safeguard our free markets from anticompetitive conduct originating overseas. It does so by revamping a little-used antitrust statute to make it a useful remedy to combat foreign cartels that are exploiting American producers and consumers.

For over 102 years America's antitrust laws have outlawed abusive monopolies and price-fixing cartels that would raise consumer prices and use those ill-gotten profits to drive their competitors out of business. Our antitrust enforcement record is indisputably the best in the world.

However, our antitrust laws do not protect American consumers or producers from the devastating effects of foreign cartels that sell products here. A case in point is the Japanese price-fixing cartel for consumer electronics that operated in our markets in the 1960's and 1970's. The cartel included the biggest brand names in the business such as Matsushita, Hitachi, Sony, Sharp, and Sanyo. There is strong evidence that this cartel used the monopoly profits that it earned in Japan by fixing high prices to subsidize below cost selling in this country. Their U.S. competitors, who could not collude or fix prices, were driven out of business by the cartel.

There is also evidence that the cartel further capitalized on their success in destroying our domestic consumer electronics industry by orchestrating a resale price maintenance scheme and a restricted advertising program that cost U.S. consumers billions of dollars.

Today, our textile, paper, glass, auto, auto parts, computer and steel industries, among others, are being threatened by the same kind of unfair international competition that destroyed our domestic consumer electronics industry.

The International Fair Competition Act that I am introducing today was reported by the Judiciary Committee last year unanimously by voice vote with no recorded objections. It enjoys wide bipartisan support because it bolsters our existing antitrust laws to attack subsidized below cost selling in our markets as a form of economic crime. But, it does so using a carefully balanced approach designed to protect consumers and producers from frivolous lawsuits.

Bringing suit under the bill requires proof that goods were sold in our markets at a price below the manufacturer's cost and were exported from a home market that is closed to international competition because it is cartelized or monopolized. However, a foreign manufacturer can defeat a lawsuit simply by showing that there was a procompetitive basis for its below cost pricing.

I believe that the bill complements the Justice Department's amendment to its international antitrust enforcement guidelines. The Department is now explicitly authorized to bring suit against anticompetitive activity abroad, including price-fixing cartels, which threaten U.S. exporters. The International Fair Competition Act would allow the antitrust authorities, private firms, and consumers to bring suit when those same cartels use the monopoly profits that they earn in their home markets to subsidize below cost selling in ours.

The fact is that price-fixing cartels are in an entrenched way of life in many foreign countries. For example, the August 1992, issue of the Harvard Business Review described the cartels that operate in Japan as "a deep-footed multifaceted" system that controls the country's business and political life. And officials from the Commerce Department have testified before the Congress that Japanese consumers pay 40 to 60 percent more than American consumers for the same goods due to the cartels and keiretsus that operate in their markets.

Japan is not the only country that harbors cartels. An American bar Association special committee on international antitrust reported that many foreign governments actively encourage or are willing to tolerate cartels that operate in their own countries. This special committee warned that these foreign cartel "seriously undermine the [free] market system and impose high costs on the world."

Unfortunately, we cannot impose our high regard for fair competition on the rest of the world. However, the International Fair Competition Act of 1993 will help encourage fairness and strong competition in international markets by preventing foreign companies based in countries that do not foster free and open competition from exploiting American consumers and producers.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 99

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "International Fair Competition Act of 1993."

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

The Congress finds that—

(1) all nations should enact and vigorously enforce strong competition laws to benefit consumers, encourage international competition, and foster growth in jobs, productivity, and investment;

(2) industries should not be allowed to take advantage of weak or nonexistent competition law enforcement in their home markets to compete unfairly in markets that do have strong competition laws and effective enforcement;

(3) existing United States antitrust law is inadequate to prevent international competitors from unfairly exploiting United States markets; it should be amended to recognize that lack of competition abroad should not result in unfair competition domestically; and

(4) United States antitrust laws applicable to foreign competitors that export articles to the United States market should be consistent with United States antitrust laws that are applicable to domestic business conduct.

SEC. 3. EXPORTATION TO THE UNITED STATES AND SALE OF ARTICLES BELOW COST.

(a) REPEAL OF CRIMINAL PROVISION.—The second paragraph of section 801 of the Act of September 8, 1916 (15 U.S.C. 72), is repealed.

(b) EXPORTATION OR SALE AT LESS THAN AVERAGE TOTAL COST.—Section 801 of the Act of September 8, 1916 (15 U.S.C. 72), as amended by subsection (a), is amended—

(1) by designating the first, second, and third paragraphs as subsections (a), (b), and (c), respectively; and

(2) by amending subsection (a), as designated by paragraph (1), to read as follows:

"(a)(1) It shall be unlawful for any person that exports a product from a foreign country into the United States, commonly and systematically to export the article into, cause the article to be exported into, or cause the article to be sold within the United States, at a price that is less than the average total cost of the article, if—

"(A) the exportation or sale has the effect of—

"(i) destroying or injuring commerce in the United States;

"(ii) preventing the establishment of a line of commerce in the United States; or

"(iii) substantially lessening competition or tending to create a monopoly in any part of trade and commerce in the article in the United States; and

"(B) the foreign country's market in the article—

"(i) lacks effective price competition among competitors; or

"(ii) is substantially closed to effective international competition.

"(2) Nothing shall prevent a defendant from rebutting a prima facie case made with respect to the circumstances described in paragraph (1) by showing that the circumstances described in paragraph (1)(B) were not a factor in the price charged."

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by subsection (b) shall become effective on the date that is 180 days after the date of enactment of this act. •

• Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I am glad today to join Senator METZENBAUM, as well as Senators SIMON and BROWN, in reintroducing the international antitrust legislation we developed during the last Congress. The bill addresses the need for consistently strong antitrust enforcement throughout the industrialized world. It seeks to ensure that our trading partners do not tolerate, and in some cases foster, industrial cartels that exclude American firms from their home markets and engage in predatory practices in our markets. American firms should not be put at a competitive disadvantage in our antitrust laws.

This bill grew out of separate bills Senator METZENBAUM and I introduced last year, S. 2352 and S. 2610. The compromise bill we are reintroducing today disallows foreign firms from using the monopoly profits they earn through domestic cartels in their home markets, at the expense of their own consumers, to subsidize below-cost pricing in the United States. The language of our bill makes clear the pricing below average total cost is prohibited if—and only if—the defendant is employing the benefits of a protected home market to charge such a price. The bill therefore creates a new cause of action to complement existing predatory pricing law.

This bill deals with an area that has not yet received the attention it is due: The nexus between trade policy and antitrust policy. In an international economy, the best way to promote truly open markets is by assuring free and open competition in every domestic marketplace. When a nation tolerates collusion among firms, consumers suffer from the inability of new firms to enter the market, and free international trade suffers from the unfair competitive advantage obtained by the colluding firms, who can subsidize below-cost prices in their exports with the profits of hard-core antitrust crimes back home.

This bill is the logical next step beyond the recent efforts of the Justice Department and the Trade Representative to achieve parity in antitrust enforcement with our trading partners in Asia and Europe. The revision of the Justice Department's international guidelines on extraterritorial cartel behavior, the antitrust aspects of the structural impediments initiative with Japan, and the United States-European Community antitrust accord, are all steps in the right direction, but they don't go far enough to ensure that American industries aren't destroyed by firms that refuse to obey the laws of free competition.

This bill will give American firms, and our Government, a new tool to deal with the U.S. effects of offshore antitrust crimes. It seeks to promote free competition in every market of the world, and to move beyond a retaliatory, protectionist approach to trade conflicts. The promotion of international antitrust enforcement is central to the development of a truly free international market economy, and I urge my colleagues to support this bill as a step in that direction. •

By Mr. RIEGLE:

S. 100. A bill to provide tax incentives for the establishment of tax enterprise zones, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

ENHANCED ENTERPRISE ZONES ACT OF 1993

• Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Enhanced Enterprise Zones Act of 1993. Senators KENNEDY, BIDEN, and KERRY join me as cosponsors. The legislation we introduce today contains the provisions to establish 50 enterprise zones that were included in the Revenue Act of 1992, which was vetoed in November by former President Bush. This bill also contains the important public investment enhancement that were added to the Revenue Act by an amendment that I offered along with the Senators who now join me as cosponsors.

The moneys to pay for the public investment authorizations for 1993 were appropriated last Congress, contingent on the passage of authorizing legislation. By introducing this legislation today, we signal our intention to ensure that this appropriation is used for its intended purpose—to provide additional Federal investment in the people and the infrastructure of distressed urban and rural communities.

Our introduction of this legislation in this particular form is not intended as an endorsement of every provision as it stands. The version of the enterprise zone bill that passed the Congress was the product of compromise among legislators in both Chambers and the Bush administration. There are several provisions, particularly on the tax side, that I, and those joining me as sponsors of this bill, believe should be altered. In fact, I consider the tax incentives included in the enterprise zone bill reported by the Senate Finance Committee to be superior to the version enacted. Nonetheless, we offer this bill, which represents where we left off at the end of the last Congress, to open discussion in the new Congress. We look forward to working with returning and new Members as well as with the new President and his administration to make this legislation to assist distressed communities as effective as possible and to see that it is but one piece in a renewed effort to empower our distressed local communities and their residents to bring themselves into the economic and social mainstream.

THE LESSONS OF BENTON HARBOR

In the past year, enterprise zones have gained increased attention as a tool to combat the lack of economic opportunity and the social decay that confront the residents of many of America's inner-cities. I have long supported enterprise zones as an experiment worth trying to bring economic opportunity to inner-city residents. But I added the public investment enhancements to the enterprise zone provisions crafted by the Finance Committee last year because I was convinced that enterprise zones as traditionally conceived are only half a strategy. And half a strategy is doomed to fail unless it is made whole.

In crafting the investment enhancements, I built on what I saw and heard in Benton Harbor, an inner-city community in my home State of Michigan. Benton Harbor is Michigan's only State-sponsored enterprise zone. The lesson that Benton Harbor has learned from its enterprise zone experience is one we here in Washington should heed as we craft Federal enterprise zone legislation: Tax incentives can be helpful, but tax incentives alone will not provide an adequate new economic start for the poor and minority residents of our inner-cities.

Tax incentives tend to empower outside businesses rather than inner-city residents. Benton Harbor's enterprise zone has been credited with attracting 100 new or expanded businesses and creating 700 jobs—but only a small fraction of those jobs have gone to the residents of Benton Harbor who are largely unskilled, poor, and minorities.

The people of Benton Harbor and of similar communities throughout the Nation must have the means to improve their job skills before they can fully take advantage of new employment opportunities. They also need better access to capital to start businesses of their own and to buy or upgrade their homes. Job skills and access to capital—along with targeted tax breaks for entrepreneurs—can be the foundation for true economic empowerment. In addition, distressed communities cannot begin to turn themselves around while most of the work force lives in dilapidated housing, has inadequate access to needed child care, and is afraid to walk the streets at night because of high crime rates and a shortage of needed police.

PUBLIC INVESTMENT ENHANCEMENTS

The public investment enhancements included in this bill provide enterprise zone communities with some of the resources they need to address these barriers to economic opportunity. In addition to $2.65 billion over 5 years in tax breaks for businesses that locate in enterprise zones, the bill provides an equal amount of public investment for enterprise zones and other distressed areas.

In 1993, the bill provides $500 million in increased authorizations for Federal resources targeted to enterprise zones and nationwide urban aid programs. The legislation appropriates no money, but the $500 million in appropriations for 1993 were included in the 1992 supplemental appropriations bill, contingent on passage of authorizing legislation.

Of the $500 million for 1993, $320 million would be allocated to a block grant for enterprise zones. Seventy percent would go to urban zones and 30 percent to rural zones. Within the two categories, the money would be evenly divided. Zones could choose from a menu of Federal programs in five areas on which to spend the money: First, crime and community policing; second, job training; third, child care and education; fourth, health, nutrition, and family assistance; and fifth, housing and community development.

Zones would be required to spend 20 percent of their grant in each category but could receive special permission to spend up to 30 percent in any one category. They could not spend less than 5 percent in any one category, however.

The remaining $180 million would be reserved for programs that empower local communities through public-private partnerships between government and community-based organizations. Almost all of this money would be spent to benefit enterprise zone residents:

The Head Start preschool education program would receive $40 million.

Community Health Centers which provide primary care in low-income areas would receive $20 million.

Job Corps, which trains disadvantaged youth in a boot-camp-like environment, would receive $40 million.

The Neighborhood Reinvestment Corporation which makes grants to community-based groups that develop affordable housing would also receive $10 million.

YouthBuild—a new program included in the 1992 housing reauthorization bill through which community groups educate and train low-income youth while they rehab and construct affordable housing—would receive $10 million.

Two new programs to increase the availability of capital for business development would also be funded: The Enterprise Capital Access Program, which was included in the enhanced enterprise zone bill I introduced last Session, would be funded with $20 million to make grants to nonprofit, community-based lenders to provide loans for business and other community development in distressed communities. And a National Community Economic Partnership Program would be funded with $40 million to provide grants to Community Development Corporations to capitalize revolving loan funds for business development lending. Fifty percent of the funds for these two programs could be spent to benefit the residents of distressed communities that do not obtain enterprise zone status.

With this investment program, enterprise zones present a promising experiment to address the challenges confronting some of our most distressed inner city and other communities. But enterprise zones are only an experiment and will reach, at least initially, only a few communities. Even a balanced enterprise zone package like this one is just the beginning in a comprehensive war on the crisis confronting urban America.

BROADER COMMITMENT NEEDED

Breaking the spiral of decline and putting America's cities on an upward path demand a concerted national commitment to reach all distressed communities. This commitment will require the dedication of substantial national resources—both immediately and over the long term—by government, and the private and not-for-profit communities alike.

This commitment should build on programs that we know work—programs like Head Start to prepare preschool kids, chapter 1 to fund additional educational programs for disadvantaged elementary and secondary school students, and Job Corps to help teenagers develop practical employment skills. But we must also develop new programs in which business and community groups work with the Government in a new urban partnership to shape cities whose residents have the economic tools needed to be self-sufficient and to produce vibrant communities.

We must make this commitment so the residents of our cities can become full participants in the social and economic mainstream of our Nation. We do this not just for reasons of equity and compassion but out of concern for our Nation's future competitiveness in the world economy. For, by the year 2000, 57 percent of the new entrants to America's work force will be drawn from the minority populations concentrated in our inner cities. Unless they have world-class work skills and economic opportunities to apply those skills, America will face serious decline.

I am encouraged that we begin this new session with a President who shares my commitment to make the investments necessary to put America's economy back on track and to make our cities an integral part of a healthy economic and social future. I look forward to working with President Clinton, and I offer the legislation I introduce today to begin discussion of how we can most quickly and efficiently achieve this shared goal. I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a letter of support for this legislation from the U.S. Conference of Mayors, the National League of Cities, the National Congress for Community Economic Development, the Neighborhood Reinvestment Corporation, the National Association of Community Health Centers, the HBI/Job Corps Coalition, and YouthBuild, U.S.A.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

December 22, 1992.

Hon. DONALD W. RIEGLE,
United States Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR RIEGLE: We are writing to express our appreciation for your leadership in seeing that social service interests were represented in the Urban Aid package passed by Congress last session. These programs were a key component along with the tax incentives included in H.R. 11 and will continue to be central to any debate on economic stimulus legislation in the 103rd Congress.

Despite bi-partisan support and funding provided through the 1992 Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act, H.R. 11 was not enacted. Though urban aid has been on the nation's agenda for almost a year, funds have yet to be channeled to communities in need.

We hope you will support efforts to ensure that the urban aid provisions of H.R. 11 are re-introduced and enacted early in the 103rd Congress.

Thank you for your continued support.

Respectfully yours,

• Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with Senators RIEGLE, BIDEN, and KERRY in reintroducing the enterprise zone legislation which fell victim to the veto by President Bush of the tax bill H.R. 11, last fall.

The Los Angeles riots turned the Nation's attention to the drastic consequences of a decade of Federal retreat and withdrawal from the festering problems of America's cities.

The fact of Federal urban neglect is indisputable. Federal aid to the cities declined by more than 50 percent between 1981 and 1991. In the past 2 years, the serious problems caused by Federal disinvestment in the cities have all been compounded by the continuing recession.

We all know it is a long road back. Our cities are in trouble, and so are many rural areas. Their wounds cannot be healed overnight. But we must make a beginning. We would never treat our national security in the cavalier and irresponsible manner we have treated our cities. We know what is at stake—the Nation's future itself. We cannot afford the reckless gamble of doing too little.

Last spring, as a first step on the road back, Congress provided funds in the supplemental appropriations bill for time-sensitive job programs targeted to inner-city youth. As a result of that initiative, nearly 300,000 more teenagers earned a paycheck last summer—nearly a 40 percent increase in the Federal Summer Jobs Program. In the major cities, the gains were even greater. Boston, for example, added 2,600 additional jobs to a base program of 3,700 jobs.

That legislation was a worthwhile bipartisan step toward reinvesting in America, and I hope that we can take another significant step in the early weeks of the 103d Congress. Our introduction of this legislation is not an endorsement of every detail of the package. The enterprise zone bill that passed the Congress last fall was the product of compromise among legislators and the Bush administration. We should place more emphasis on tax incentives that encourage hiring zone residents. We are introducing this bill, however, because it is where we left off at the end of the last Congress, and it is the most appropriate starting point for debate in the new Congress. I look forward to working with the Clinton administration and the new Members of Congress to make this legislation as effective as possible.

The enterprise zone concept in this legislation is an experiment. If it works, the incentives will help only a small number of communities, but they will be a large step in the right direction, because they will show the right way to thousands of other communities in all parts of America.

The bill that we are introducing is designed to enhance the enterprise zone concept by incorporating the basic principle that tax breaks alone are not enough to make the concept work.

This legislation assures that we will also invest directly in the people in the enterprise zones, and that these investments in people will be approximately equal in dollar amount to the tax incentives offered to businesses that invest in the enterprise zones.

In a sense, what we are creating by this amendment is a worthwhile competition between tax expenditures and direct expenditures, and may the best incentive win. In fact, the likely result is that the whole will be greater than the sum of its two parts, and both types of Federal spending will prove essential in achieving the goal we all share.

The funds for the public investments in 1993 were appropriated last year, contingent on the passage of authorizing legislation. I have been informed by CBO and OMB that passage of that authorization will not be scored as additional spending and will require no additional appropriation for this fiscal year.

The public investment part of this bill assures that new tax benefits to encourage private investment in enterprise zones will be accompanied by $500 million a year in new public investments in jobs, job training, housing rehabilitation, education and health care, so that residents in the zones can participate in the benefits of the businesses that move in. One hundred and eighty million dollars a year is set aside for proven approaches to urban and rural revitalization, including Head Start, Job Corps, and Community Health Centers.

Also incorporated in the bill is separate legislation entitled the "National Community Partnership Act." These provisions authorize additional funding for community development corporations to make technical and financial assistance available to small businesses.

The continuing credit crunch has made it very difficult for these enterprises to obtain the financing they need without the assistance of CDC's. For example, a Boston CDC, Nuestra Comunidad—Our Community—made five loans last year to local businesses that could not obtain financing from a traditional bank. In one case, a small party-rental firm was able to use its CDC micro-loan to obtain other loans, and it expanded to create three new jobs for local residents.

The National Community Partnership Act mandates a local dollar-for-dollar match of each Federal dollar.

This approach ensures that public resources will be provided only where the private sector has made an up-front commitment to the neighborhoods of the community.

Funding is also provided to improve law enforcement in the enterprise zones through programs that encourage neighborhood policing and alternative sentencing options such as boot camps and community service. The zones are given flexibility to design a public investment program that fits the special needs of individual communities.

I hope that this measure is the start of a new national commitment to our cities and rural areas. We all know that we must do a better job of addressing the long-run domestic challenges we face in order to rebuild America's strength. A decade of neglect has red-lined the entire Nation—not just our poorest communities. We have suffered disinvestment in a wide range of vital needs such as education, job training, housing, health care, and research and development. The needs are more urgent than ever, and it is time to make a beginning. I urge the Senate to act quickly on this bill.

• Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I rise to support the legislation proposed by my colleagues Senator RIEGLE and Senator KENNEDY to create 50 enterprise zones and to channel urgently needed funds to our neediest neighborhoods. I support this measure knowing that it does not authorize the kind of major investments in urban America that we so urgently need. This bill is only a downpayment. But it is long past time that we did something for our cities and this legislation, which represents a compromise agreement hammered out in Congress last year, stands an excellent chance of obtaining quick passage and getting aid out to those who need it.

It will do this in large part through the creation of enterprise zones in which I am a firm believer. I believe that an increased flow of private capital is an essential prerequisite to the revival of urban neighborhoods. A Federal enterprise zone program would supplement existing State programs and create opportunity where existing market conditions and incentives do not.

But this legislation will not rely only on enterprise zones which, clearly, are not sufficient. Expert after expert has testified that a comprehensive approach to urban rebuilding is needed. That includes incentives for the private sector; it also includes long term investments in education, job training, drug rehabilitation, community policing and the basic building blocks of community life.

In recognition of this fact, this legislation authorizes $500 million in 1993 for programs that are of proven value like Head Start, Youthbuild, and community development block grants. It targets about 60 percent of the money on the enterprise zones that will be created by the bill.

These redevelopment grants, as they are called, and enterprise zones are the kinds of basic assistance that we owe our cities. In too many of our urban neighborhoods today, the first sounds infants learn to identify are police and ambulance sirens, hovering helicopters, and gunfire; there are kids barely in their teens who've lost more classmates than I lost buddies in Vietnam; the life expectancy for men in some of our cities is lower than it is in Bangladesh; and nationally one in four young black males is involved in the judicial system—awaiting trial, in jail or on probation.

We cannot go on like this. Deep down, we know we will not be able to compete internationally if too many of our young people are in jail or on drugs or always in the streets; we will never get out of debt if we must allocate billions more each year to prisons, prosecutions, emergency health care, expanded welfare and food stamps or rebuilding what the desperate among us have destroyed; and we will never have peace of mind as long as so many of us feel the need to seek security through locked doors, high fences, metal detectors, and the purchase of guns.

Deep down, we also know that it doesn't have to be this way. The random deaths, the desperation, the lives strangled by poverty, the unfairness—it's all avoidable; we have the power to choose a different road.

That choice begins, although it does not end, with money and how we spend it. Over the past 12 years, the Reagan-Bush administrations reduced the Federal share of city expenditures from 17 to 6 percent. Over the same period, Federal support for housing, in real terms, dropped by 82 percent; for job training by 63 percent, for community development, by 40 percent, and for social service and community service block grants by 40 percent. Is it any wonder that our cities erupted in anger last summer?

If, as President Clinton asks us to, we are to reinvent America, to reunite the country, we've got to reverse this pattern of abandonment of our cities.

We also must join the President in reforming Government into an effective catalyst for change. It is not enough to simply throw money at the problem; we must throw away old approaches that haven't worked, while building on those that would have worked better if only given the chance. We need community participation, not big Government. We need incentives, not entitlements. We need new ideas, like bringing ex-military personnel into our cities as teachers and counselors and community organizers. We need to motivate people to take charge of their own lives, not make it easier for them to avoid hard choices and thereby fall into lives of dependency and complacency.

President Clinton has united the country behind this approach and this bill is very much in the spirit of pragmatism and mutual responsibility that he has emphasized. It seeks to help our cities by giving the people who live in them an effective means of helping themselves.

I am very proud to be a cosponsor of this bill and will work hard for its passage. I am also aware that our new President is in the process of assembling a talented domestic policy team which will look at these problems anew. Should President Clinton present to the Congress a different approach from the one taken here, I am confident that all who are joining in support of this bill will examine his suggestions closely and enthusiastically work with him on legislation encompassing the best of both proposals.

By Mr. GLENN:

S. 101. A bill to establish a National Commission on Executive Organization Reform; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EXECUTIVE ORGANIZATION REFORM ACT

• Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce that Executive Organization Reform Act of 1993, legislation that I believe will help improve the organization and structure of the Federal Government.

A new administration and a new Congress face not only the burdens of our past, such as the massive Federal deficit, but the challenges of our future, such as national and economic security concerns. Yet the executive branch of the Federal Government that exists to meet these burdens and challenges is antiquated and poorly organized. As our Nation now looks forward, it does so with a Government that is outmoded and duplicative, a Government that is inefficient and inconsistent, a Government that is rife with waste, fraud, and mismanagement.

A smaller and leaner Federal Government is necessary for this country to solve its deficit problems. And a more effective and efficient Federal Government is necessary for this country to handle the many challenges it now faces. It is impossible, for example, for the United States to successfully promote jobs and economic growth when the Government has some 125 different employment programs scattered across the bureaucracy. And it is no wonder that the country's international competitiveness is challenged when our coordinated response comes from Commerce programs split in different departments and agencies. The same goes for Federal efforts to handle the environment, natural resources, health and housing and many other programs.

We must have a Government that responds better to our needs now and in the next century. This is why I am introducing the Executive Organization Reform Act of 1993. If Americans are to regain confidence in their Government's ability to solve problems, and if our Government is to truly help meet the needs of the next century, then we must create a structure and organization that can accomplish these tasks.

The Executive Organization Reform Act of 1993 will establish a national commission whose job it will be to study and recommend ways to reorganize and reform the Government for the next century. This is no ordinary commission, in the way that Washington sets up commissions whose recommendations are ignored and sit on a shelf. To ensure that this commission's important recommendations get appropriate attention, my bill requires that Congress vote on a joint resolution acting on the organization changes proposed by the commission.

I am aware that organizational change of the executive branch has not always been a popular topic, and that many insiders counsel against spending political capital in an area of Government that can be so difficult to change. I must say, though, that as chairman of the Governmental Affairs Committee, I have become convinced that only through improving the management of the Federal Government—and that includes its organization and structure—can we improve the programs and services Americans expect from their Government.

I am certain that not everyone will like all the recommendations that any commission to reorganize Government might propose. But political expediency should not be allowed to keep our Government from organizing itself to meet the challenges of our future. I am confident that a streamlined and more effective Government will help us better perform our public missions and regain the confidence of the American people in the process.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy and summary of the legislation be placed into the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 101

All points of order against the joint resolution (and against consideration of the joint resolution) are waived. The motion is highly privileged in the House of Representatives and is privileged in the Senate and is not debatable. The motion is not subject to amendment, or to a motion to postpone, or to a motion to proceed to the consideration of other business. A motion to reconsider the vote by which the motion is agreed to or disagreed to shall not be in order. A motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution is agreed to or disagreed to is not in order.

(3) FINAL PASSAGE.—Immediately following the conclusion of the debate on a joint resolution described in subsection (a) and a sin-

(4) APPEALS FROM CHAIR.—Appeals from the decisions of the Chair relating to the application of the rules of the Senate or the House of Representatives, as the case may be, to the procedure relating to a joint resolution described in subsection (a) shall be decided without debate.

(e) CONSIDERATION BY OTHER HOUSE.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—If, before the passage by one House of a joint resolution of that House described in subsection (a), that House receives from the other House a joint resolution described in subsection (a), then the following procedures shall apply:

(A) The joint resolution of the other House shall not be referred to a committee and may not be considered in the House receiving it except in the case of final passage as provided in subparagraph (B)(ii).

(B) With respect to a joint resolution described in subsection (a) of the House receiving the joint resolution—

(i) the procedure in that House shall be the same as if no joint resolution had been received from the other House; but

(ii) the vote on final passage shall be on the joint resolution of the other House.

(2) FINAL DISPOSITION.—Upon disposition of the joint resolution received from the other House, it shall no longer be in order to consider the joint resolution that originated in the receiving House.

(f) RULES OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE.—This section is enacted by Congress—

(2) with full recognition of the constitutional right of either House to change the rules (so far as relating to the procedure of that House) at any time, in the same manner, and to the same extent as in the case of any other rule of that House.

S. 102. A bill to provide for a line-item veto; capital gains tax reduction; enterprise zones; raising the Social Security earnings limit; and workfare; to the Committee on Finance.

ECONOMIC RECOVERY ACT OF 1993

● Mr. MACK. Mr. President, the new President, like those before him, will be judged in large part by how well he keeps his campaign commitments. That is an appropriate test.

In recent days, there has been some criticism of the new President for backing away from certain campaign promises.

Bill Clinton was elected on the basis of his convictions, commitments, and pledges to the American people, especially when it comes to the economy. Today, I and many other Senate Republicans stand ready to help President Clinton follow through on his core commitment to spur the economy and revitalize the American spirit of innovation and competition. There are a number of policies he advocated during the campaign that Republicans have supported for years.

During these next 100 days, we urge the President to move forward in these areas of substantial agreement to ensure that the following five Clinton proposals become law: enacting a line-item veto; cutting certain taxes on long-term capital gains; creating Federal enterprise zones; lifting the Social Security earnings test limit to allow more seniors to work; and implementing workfare to encourage self-sufficiency.

A number of Senate Republicans pledge to stand shoulder to shoulder with President Clinton to fight for these ideas.

We've taken these five Clinton initiatives from his book "Putting People First" and have used his details to introduce a legislative package that must be passed immediately to help get America moving.

The American people supported these Clinton initiatives and the group of Senate Republicans intends to see them passed.

First, enact the line-item veto. Bill Clinton ran on the promise of a line-item veto, saying "to eliminate pork-barrel projects and cut government waste, give the President the line-item veto." He should fight for it and stick to his promise by rejecting attempts to water down the issue in Congress.

Our legislative package includes the line-item veto bill introduced in the 102d Congress as S. 196 by Senators MCCAIN and COATS. It would give President Clinton the authority to rescind portions of spending bills and, in contrast to present law, require the Congress to act in order to override the rescission.

Second, cut capital gains taxes. The bill is taken from the President's statement that he would "Help small businesses and entrepreneurs by offering a 50-percent tax exclusion to those who take risks by making long-term investments in new businesses." He's right. Few initiatives would stimulate growth and investment in the economy like a capital gains tax cut.

Our legislation includes a bill introduced by Senator BUMPERS in the previous Congress that allows investors in small business ventures to receive a 50-percent reduction in capital gains tax on investments held for 5 years.

Third, create Federal enterprise zones. Perhaps Jack Kemp's most brilliant idea, enterprise zones, would provide companies with incentives to locate in areas of high unemployment. President Clinton said that he wants to:

Create urban enterprise zones in stagnant inner cities, but only for companies willing to take responsibility by hiring inner city residents. Business taxes and Federal regulations will be minimized to provide incentives to set up shop. In return, companies will have to make jobs for local residents a priority.

Our bill is based on legislation developed last year by then-Senator Lloyd Bentsen, Clinton's Treasury Secretary, which would create 50 enterprise zones. In these zones, employers would receive a 15-percent tax credit based on the wages it pays to its employees. Also, 50 percent of capital gains from investments would be exempt from tax if held in an enterprise zone for at least 5 years.

Fourth, lift the Social Security earnings test. Clinton said:

Lift the Social Security earnings test limitation so that older Americans are able to help rebuild our economy and create a better future for all.

As senior Americans remain in the work force longer, a law enacted in the 1930's penalizes senior workers who also receive Social Security.

Our plan, which is based upon legislation introduced by Senator Bentsen last year, raises the limit on earnings for recipients from the current $10,560 in 1993 to $51,000 in 2001.

Fifth, implement workfare. Bill Clinton pledged that welfare reform would be a top priority. He said:

Scrap the current welfare system to make welfare a second chance, not a way of life. Empower people on welfare with education, training, and child care they need for up to two years so they can break the cycle of dependency. After that, those who are able will be required to work, either in the private sector or through community service. Provide placement assistance to help everyone find a job, and give the people who can't find one a dignified and meaningful community service job.

Our bill includes a directive to the new President's Departments of Labor and Health and Human Services to develop a legislative package which mirrors Clinton's words, and send it to Congress within 100 days.

Bill Clinton was elected on the economic promises he made. Our hand is extended to the new President to enact his five initiatives for the good of the Nation. We'll stand up and fight for them. We hope the President will do the same.

By Mr. NICKLES (for himself, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. PACKWOOD, Mr. BROWN, Mr. COATS, Mr. KEMPTHORNE, and Mr. COVERDELL):

S. 103. A bill to fully apply the rights and protections of Federal civil rights and labor laws to employment by Congress; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

CONGRESSIONAL AND PRESIDENTIAL ACCOUNTABILITY ACT

• Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, today the bill I send to the desk with Senator KASSEBAUM, Senator BROWN, Senator COATS, and Senator KEMPTHORNE is similar to one I and some of my colleagues introduced last Congress and is intended to eliminate the double standard which presently exists for the Congress and the executive branch in certain labor, civil rights and health and safety laws it has passed in the last 50 years.

Traditionally, Congress has exempted itself from civil rights, health, safety and many other labor laws which have been applied to the private sector as well as the Federal executive and judicial branch. This idea that Congress should not impose laws on the Nation that it will not live under itself is not a new one. A quote by James Madison in the Federalist Papers clearly states this:

Congress can make no law which will not have its full operation on themselves and their friends, as well as on the great mass of society.

During consideration of the Civil Rights Act of 1991, I offered an amendment which would have made Congress and its instrumentalities subject to all regulations and remedies contained in the following laws: the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, Equal Pay Act of 1963, Civil Rights Act of 1964, Age Discrimination Act of 1967 and amendments of 1975, Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970, Equal Employment Opportunity Act of 1972, Rehabilitation Act of 1973, Americans With Disabilities Act of 1990. In amendment form, this legislation received 38 votes last Congress and I believe with the influx of new Members calling for change, this legislation can pass. Later, I introduced the amendment as a free-standing bill, the Congressional and Presidential Accountability Act.

Since my first efforts on the Civil Rights Act of 1991 and the efforts of those before me on this issue, we have made some progress. With the adoption of the Civil Rights Act of 1991 and the establishment of a bipartisan task force to study the problem of Congress living under the laws it enacts, we have taken a step in the right direction. However, I simply do not believe Congress has gone far enough in making sure Congress lives under the same laws as everyone else. I want to ensure that the task force is not just window dressing.

My colleagues and I recognize that this legislation is not perfect. This legislation represents a starting point for the task force to begin its deliberations. We introduce this legislation hoping that the task force can use it to reach a consensus on our ultimate objective—Congress living under the laws it enacts for the rest of the American people.

A clear ultimatum was issued in the general election: Congress must lead by example and not by exemption. If we are going to impose these standards, remedies, and procedures on Federal agencies, State and local governments, and the private sector we must impose them on ourselves.

If business runs afoul of any of the laws listed in my bill, they face endless bureaucratic headaches and Federal court litigation. Congress has exempted itself from the above-mentioned laws completely or has limited redress to be determined by only an internal mechanism with no right to judicial appeal. Would we allow major corporations to set up their own rules for dealing with complaints under these laws? The answer is obviously, no.

Congress must no longer tell the American public that we are exempt from the laws which we pass in this Chamber every day. Therefore, I encourage my colleagues to support this important piece of legislation. •

By Mr. HATFIELD (for himself, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. CHAFEE, and Mr. SIMON):

S. 104. A bill to establish a National Center for Sleep Disorders Research within the National Heart, Lung, and Blood Institute, to coordinate sleep disorders research within the National Institutes of Health to further facilitate the study of sleep disorders, and to establish a mechanism for education and training in sleep disorders, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

NATIONAL CENTER FOR SLEEP DISORDERS RESEARCH

• Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, today, along with my colleagues, Senators KENNEDY, CHAFEE, and SIMON, I am introducing legislation to create a National Center for Sleep Disorders Research within the National Heart, Lung, and Blood Institute of the National Institutes of Health. Since there is presently no entity within the Federal Government that deals expressly with sleep and considering the catastrophic effect of sleep disorders on our society, today marks a historic step toward finding potential answers to sleep disorders through the promise of biomedical research.

The National Commission on Sleep Disorders Research was established by Congress in 1988. It was charged with assessing the problem and prevalence of sleep disorders, reviewing Federal sleep disorders research, prevention and education programs, and making recommendations to the executive and legislative branches on improving the Federal response to sleep disorders.

Recently the National Commission completed the most comprehensive study ever conducted into the state of sleep disorders in this country. During the last 3 years, this group held eight public hearings, commissioned dozens of formal position papers and reviewed the testimonies of several hundred individuals whose lives had been affected by sleep disorders. The result of this painstaking research is a report which powerfully states the extent to which sleep disorders adversely affect our country.

The National Commission found that sleep disorders exact a tremendous toll on our Nation's population—nearly 40 million Americans are chronically ill with a sleep disorder and an additional 20 to 30 million experience intermittent sleep-related problems. In addition to the tremendous personal pain and suffering they inflict, sleep disorders are a tremendous drain on the productivity and safety of our country: Falling asleep at the wheel is one of the most costly and devastating problems on American highways; accidents in the workplace due to sleep deprivation are commonplace and damaging to industry—the annual cost to society is over $50 billion.

The adverse affects of sleep disorders have been tragically evident in my home State of Oregon. In a recent Portland-area case that gained national publicity, the McDonald's Corp. was held liable for a fatal traffic accident caused by an employee who fell asleep at the wheel after working all night. A second example occurred on November 22, 1992, in Harrisburg, OR, and involved the collision of two Southern Pacific freight trains. According to the National Transportation Safety Board, the trains collided because the engineers had fallen asleep and not responded to a stop signal in a timely manner. While the accident had the potential for serious injury, it fortunately caused only three minor injuries. Costs, however, to the company were estimated at nearly $3.5 million.

The grounding of the Exxon Valdez on March 24, 1989, provides an additional illustration of the consequences of sleep deprivation in the workplace. The final report of the National Transportation Safety Board concluded that, "the probable cause of the grounding of the Exxon Valdez was the failure of the third mate to properly maneuver the vessel because of fatigue and excessive work load." Unfortunately, vehicular and other accidents caused by sleep disorders are all too common.

Just as damaging is society's complete lack of awareness of sleep disorders and their consequences. In addition to finding little awareness of sleep disorders, the National Commission found serious gaps in medical research and alarmingly few young investigators in the pipeline. It seems highly probable that this "reservoir of ignorance" is a major reason why 95 percent of all individuals afflicted with a sleep disorder remain undiagnosed.

In order to address these problems, the National Commission recommended that the Federal Government undertake a series of initiatives. The cornerstone of these recommendations calls for the establishment of a National Center for Sleep Disorders Research within an existing Institute of the National Institutes of Health.

My belief in the establishment of a National Center for Sleep Disorders Research was further reinforced at a special hearing of the Senate Appropriations Committee in Portland last November 3. This hearing brought together a wide array of individuals with an interest in sleep disorders, including several fellow Oregonians whose lives were personally and professionally affected by sleep disorders. I found the personal testimonies of Mary Eichler, Sgt. Tim Weaver, Freddy-Lou Barneberg, and Dr. Gary Hoffman particularly compelling. In addition, Dr. Gerald Rich and Dr. Robert Sack of the Oregon Health Sciences University were persuasive in their testimony supporting the establishment of a National Center for Sleep Disorders Research. As patients and professionals whose lives have been affected by sleep disorders, their support for the establishment of a National Center for Sleep Disorders Research was instrumental in my decision to introduce legislation today.

Several leading medical groups, representing the diverse interests of patients, professionals and industry, have also endorsed the establishment of a National Center for Sleep Disorders Research, including American College of Chest Physicians, American Sleep Disorders Association, American Thoracic Society, Association of Polysomnographic Technologists, Sleep Research Society, American Narcolepsy Association, American Sleep Apnea Association, A.W.A.K.E. Network, Better Sleep Council, Narcolepsy Network, and the National Sleep Foundation.

The National Commission's work is done—they have eloquently stated the problems and laid the solutions before us. As policymakers, we now must act. I am pleased that my colleague from Massachusetts, Senator KENNEDY, has included authorization for the Center within his version of legislation reauthorizing the National Institutes of Health and I look forward to working with him and other members of the Senate Labor Committee to see this legislation enacted into law.

I also want to commend Dr. William Dement, Chairman of the National Commission on Sleep Disorders Research, and the other commissioners for their hard work, perseverance and leadership on this issue. By providing Congress with a clear cut policy mandate, the commissioners have served their profession with distinction. I will include for the RECORD, a summary of the findings and recommendations of the National Commission on Sleep Disorders Research.

Mr. President, the Federal Government has a role to play in issues which cross state-lines and affect millions of Americans, particularly when the cost in terms of lives, dollars, and human suffering is high. In the case of sleep disorders the cost is too high. America cannot afford to hit the snooze button, roll over and go back to sleep when it comes to this problem. At least for those who are able to sleep.

I also ask that the text of my legislation be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OVERVIEW OF THE FINDINGS OF THE NATIONAL COMMISSION ON SLEEP DISORDERS RESEARCH

Millions of Americans are affected by sleep disorders. 40 million Americans are chronically ill with various sleep disorders and an additional 20 to 30 million experience intermittent sleep related problems. The consequences of sleep disorders are diverse, serious and often catastrophic.

Sleep disorders affect all age groups. Few people are aware that sleep disorders exist at every age level from the sudden infant death syndrome to sundowning in the elderly. Children, adolescents, young adults, middle-aged adults and especially the elderly are afflicted.

Minorities and the poor have extremely limited access to sleep medicine. Current research also indicates that these groups may have an even higher incidence of sleep related disorders, especially those associated with obesity, such as sleep apnea.

America is seriously sleep-deprived with disastrous consequences. Falling asleep at the wheel is one of the most costly and devastating problems on American highways. Accidents in the workplace due to sleep deprivation are commonplace and damaging to industry. Students asleep in class miss opportunities that will help them foster careers. Every component of society is seriously impaired by sleep deprivation.

The cost in dollars, lives and human suffering is very high. There are no well-established databases on the cost of sleep disorders and sleep deprivation. The Commission was able to definitely assign $15.9 billion as the direct cost of sleep disorders with an estimated $50 to $100 billion in indirect and related costs when the cost of individual accidents associated with sleep disorders and sleep deprivation are assessed including litigation, destruction of property, hospitalization and death.

Pervasive failure of knowledge transfer. The Commission found no component of society adequately aware of sleep disorders and the facts of sleep deprivation. Most importantly, primary care physicians are in desperate need of adequate information. Currently 95 percent of patients with sleep disorders remain undiagnosed.

There are many serious gaps in research. Many important areas in sleep research remain uninvestigated due to a lack of funding and coordination on a federal level. Some of the most crucial areas, such as insomnia (which affects approximately one in three Americans), have little or no current research activity.

Alarming few young investigators in the pipeline. At present, there are under twenty young investigators in training programs for sleep research. Due to the multidisciplinary nature of sleep research and sleep medicine, there are many qualified individuals within existing disciplines such as molecular biology and neurochemistry. With increased funding for training and research many could pursue careers in the field of sleep research.

RECOMMENDATIONS

The National Commission on Sleep Disorders Research has proposed for immediate implementation, six basic recommendations that will ensure the greatest benefit at the smallest cost. Even if resources were unlimited, the ambitious goal of changing the way society deals with sleep could not be accomplished overnight. These six recommendations will launch the long-range national plan to create an environment in which research findings and education programs will lead to early diagnosis and prevention of sleep disorders and reduce the impact of sleep deprivation.

Recommendation One: Establish a National Center

Our nation needs an accountable structure to coordinate education and research on sleep disorders. The Commissioners unanimously agreed that the best possible mechanism to address the urgent needs of American society would be a national center within an existing Institute of the National Institutes of Health. The Commission recommends that the Congress authorize the establishment of and appropriate sufficient funds to support a National Center for research and education on sleep and sleep disorders to be housed within an existing NIH Institute. The center's activities will complement the sleep and sleep disorder related research currently undertaken by the various National Institutes of Health and Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health Administration (ADAMHA), and, through its own award authority, shall encourage and support gap-filling and crosscutting research, and develop new research programs and educational/training initiatives in the field.

Recommendation Two: Strengthen Ongoing Programs

Solving society's biggest sleep related problems must be a national priority. The Commission recommends that federal support for basic, clinical, epidemiological, health services, and prevention research on sleep and sleep disorders be expanded. Existing research commitments by the NIH and ADAMHA Institutes, as well as the Centers for Disease Control, Department of Veterans Affairs, Department of Defense, and other federal agencies currently engaged in sleep and sleep disorders research should be strengthened.

Recommendation Three: Accountability in All Federal Agencies

The Commission found a near total absence of overall coordination and accountability for issues related to sleep among widely dispersed activities managed and regulated by the many federal agencies. The Commission recommends the establishment of specifically identified offices on sleep and sleep disorders within all federal departments and agencies whose programs affect or are affected by issues of sleep and sleep disorders, and that the Office of Science Technology Policy undertake a feasibility study for the establishment of a special body to ensure coordination, cooperation, and collaboration among the separate agency-based sleep/sleep disorder offices.

Recommendation Four: Training and Career Development

The Commission identified a serious lack of career and training opportunities for young investigators interested in the field of sleep. Research is essential for cures and better treatment of sleep disorders. Currently, the important research questions far outnumber the available trained investigators. The Commission recommends that substantially increased levels of federal support be directed to the NIH and ADAMHA, as well as to the Centers for Disease Control, the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Department of Defense, specifically for sleep and sleep disorder research training and career development opportunities.

Recommendation Five: Education of Health Professionals

Ninety-five percent of the victims remain undiagnosed, largely because health professionals have not had the opportunity to learn about sleep disorders and sleep deprivation. There is an urgent need for physicians, nurses, and all health care professionals to be able to identify and refer or treat patients with sleep disorders. The Commission recommends that Congress encourage and support broader awareness of and training in sleep and sleep disorders spanning the full range of health care professions, particularly at the primary care level.

Recommendation Six: An Educated America

The lack of awareness throughout America about the nature and impact of sleep disorders and sleep deprivation is a national emergency. Witnesses asked repeatedly, "How many preventable deaths are going to occur this year?" "Why don't we do something right now?" The Commission has concluded that the American public has been inappropriately denied the benefits of the research knowledge its tax dollars have supported. The Commission recommends that a major public awareness/education campaign about sleep and sleep disorders be undertaken immediately by the federal government. •

By Mr. JEFFORDS (for himself, Mr. DURENBERGER, and Mrs. KASSEBAUM):

S. 105. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 and the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 to improve pension plan funding; to the Committee on Finance.

PENSION FUNDING IMPROVEMENT ACT

• Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. President, yesterday we witnessed the start of a new era in American politics with the inauguration of President Clinton. Our President referred to the event as a new beginning for our Nation, a time in which we all must take responsibility for our Nation's problems. He wisely reflected that in doing this we as a country, both individually and collectively, must change present attitudes and be prepared to stop looking for something for nothing. Everyone must give within their ability. Everybody must do their fair share.

Today, on the first day of official business, my distinguished colleagues Senator DURENBERGER, Senator KASSEBAUM, join me in introducing a bill that I believe would extend the President's philosophy to the increasingly important area of pension policy. It is a bill designed to solve the problems of a beleaguered, deficit-ridden Government agency, the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation or PBGC. The agency is not familiar to most of us. However, it insures the defined benefit pension plans of over 40 million Americans. Its importance and deteriorating financial condition is becoming more apparent with each passing day. Since this subject was brought up in the Presidential debates last November, there have been numerous press accounts providing us with the grim details of events involving the evasion of corporate responsibility. Such problematic behavior will surely result in less of a pension for many dedicated workers who have often given their whole lives in service to a particular company.

The problem, simply put, is that big companies in troubled times are taking advantage of our pension insurance system. They promise big pensions to workers, regularly increasing benefits, while making the most minimum funding contributions permitted under the law. The troubled companies then terminate their pension plan and pass along their pension debt to the PBGC. Billions of dollars of debt are involved.

Our solution, is the Pension Funding Improvement Act of 1993, a three-part bill we are introducing today. It assigns individual responsibility to every company that makes pension promises, saying in very unambiguous terms that if a company makes a pension promise, it had better be willing to act to keep that promise. Part I of the bill includes stronger funding rules for underfunded pension plans, to ensure the faster funding of present unfunded pension obligations. Part II, prevents a bad situation from getting worse, by requiring underfunded plan sponsors to immediately fund up their plan or put up collateral in order to increase pension benefits. Part III includes Congressional Budget Office and PBGC studies of what premium increases would be necessary to balance the PBGC's accounts.

Since the bill was first introduced last August, the case for reform has just grown stronger. Every day we wait is a day where plan underfunding increases. We have had three congressional hearings outlining the consequences of the loopholes in present pension law. Moreover, on January 6, the GAO released a report explaining that the potential risk from poorly funded pension plans is much greater than was originally anticipated. Previous to this, in December, the GAO issued a special high risk report on the PBGC. This is a special series of reports done to target Federal programs that are especially vulnerable to high risk.

How many reports and hearings will be necessary before we make needed changes in law? If experience serves as an example, the problem may well need to escalate to the point where it truly parallels the savings and loan crisis, before we enact a needed change in the law.

This is why my knowledgeable colleague, Representative JAKE PICKLE, introduced a companion PBGC bill on January 5. As chairman of the Subcommittee on Oversight of the House Ways and Means Committee, he will hold a further hearing on this issue in February, to review the impact of current law on the Federal deficit, plan retirees, and plan sponsors. I understand the House Education and Labor Committee will also hold a similar hearing.

As of today, the PBGC has a deficit of $2.5 billion. This is largely a result of the following recent pension plan terminations: First, in 1990, Eastern Airlines terminated its plan with $700 million in unfunded liabilities. Next, in 1991, Pan American Airlines terminated its plan with $900 million in unfunded liabilities. Then, in 1992, Blaw Knox terminated with $81.6 million in unfunded liabilities, C.F. & I. Steel Co. terminated with $270 million in unfunded liabilities, and Uniroyal Plastics, Inc., terminated with $156 million in unfunded liabilities.

And the trend is expected to increase. This is not surprising since current pension law has provided a way for struggling companies to shift the costs of their pension benefits. These companies routinely grant employees increases, knowing full well that if their company continues to be financially troubled they will be able to terminate their pension plans and dump the pension plan's obligations onto the PBGC. The PBGC predicts that it is significantly at risk for about $13 billion in benefits provided by pension plans of companies in the steel, auto, airline, tire, and rubber industries.

Each year the PBGC publishes a list of those top 50 underfunded pension plans who are the most at risk. When one compares corporate funding over the last 3 years, the facts unfortunately show that plan funding for the top 50 has gone down by $10.7 billion since 1988. Collectively, the top 50 are $24.2 billion in the red.

Last month TWA announced it is expected to emerge from bankruptcy this year. It also made an agreement with the PBGC to pay $500 million of its $1 billion pension debt. That's the good news. The bad news, however, is that even though TWA has promised it will pay for about half of its pension obligations, fully $300 million in promised benefits are beyond the scope of the PBGC's guarantee. Therefore, many TWA workers will never see certain early retirement benefits they have been promised. Furthermore, there is still expected to be at least $400 million in underfunded guaranteed benefits that will need to be paid for by the PBGC. Where is this money going to come from? This is my concern.

For some time now, companies with underfunded pension plans have been promising significant amounts of new benefits in lieu of wage increases. And while the trend is occurring in the steel, tire, and rubber industries, the problem is most acute in the automobile industry. At present Chrysler Corp. is $3.9 billion underfunded, and General Motors Corp. is in the red by a whopping $11.8 billion. This is according to the optimistic assumptions of their own actuaries. But both organizations will tell you not to worry because their pension promises are as good as the strength of their companies.

If this isn't bad enough, earlier this year, we witnessed further corporate practices that are just obscene: companies already in bankruptcy are agreeing to retroactive benefit increases.

Last year when TWA first filed for bankruptcy, their plan was considered 84 percent funded for guaranteed benefits. Since this time it gave a retroactive increase in benefits that caused an additional $53 million in underfunding. It is now $1.2 billion underfunded.

This past spring, a bankruptcy court approved benefit increases for Continental Airlines pilots that will almost double the plan's underfunding to about $191 million.

Now, some people will argue that financially distressed companies need to minimize contributions to the pension plan so that this money can instead be put into the company, to increase productivity and competitiveness. I personally would argue that it is precisely because a company is financially vulnerable, that an extra effort should be made to be sure that the pension plan is financially sound. So if workers need to take early retirement due to financial downsizing resulting from problems in the global marketplace, they can be certain that money will be there.

Many people will also argue that the PBGC was deliberately designed to subsidize companies in ailing industries. They are, however, at direct odds with the many who believe the PBGC should operate like a private sector insurer and set premiums more precisely related to the risk that a company would have of defaulting on its pension promises.

Regardless of what one thinks about the purpose of the PBGC, the reality is our public policy options on how to rectify the PBGC's deficit problem are limited. Furthermore, it is in the best interest of the 40 million workers who currently have PBGC insurance protection, as well as the defined benefit plan system, that we review our objectives for the PBGC and act quickly to resolve the PBGC's deficit problems.

What are our options? The PBGC is currently financed exclusively from premiums plan sponsors pay into the system, those pension assets remaining in terminated underfunded plans and interest. Given this fact, one alternative would be to raise PBGC premiums that employers pay into the system. This may be inevitable, given the PBGC's current deficit. The PBGC estimates that it would have to significantly increase premiums, even if it takes on only $500 million a year in underfunded liabilities, which is very likely given recent experience. Under a middle of the road scenario, the PBGC estimates that premiums paid by all single employer plan sponsors will rise to $58 per person for well funded plans, and to as much as $219 per participant for poorly funded plans. We have already raised premiums considerably from those days in 1974 when all plan sponsors paid a dollar a head for each plan participant.

How much is too much? When will responsible employers with well funded plans say they've had enough of premium increases to pay for obligations promised by other companies, especially their competitors? When will they terminate their own defined benefit plan and instead offer to make contributions to a defined contribution plan under which employer liabilities are fixed and employees have no insurance protection? I'm sure. Even at present premium levels, the trend is away from defined benefit plans. Pension experts of all political philosophies, who don't always agree on other matters, agree that the defined benefit plan universe is shrinking. The number of defined benefit plan terminations are increasing, and fewer and fewer new defined benefit plans are entering into the system.

Last August, the Senate Labor Subcommittee held a hearing on current pension trends. At this hearing our knowledgeable subcommittee chairman, Senator METZENBAUM, spoke of his deep concern about the future of the defined benefit plan system. I completely agree with his point and would like to quote from his statement, "Employers are abandoning defined benefit pension plans which are designed to provide specific levels of retirement income." He went on to say that the effects of this trend are devastating for low-income workers. At this same hearing, the American Academy of Actuaries stated that one of the main reasons for this trend away from defined benefit plans is the unsound PBGC. To quote from the group's testimony:

Congress and the Executive branch must work to restore confidence among defined benefit plan sponsors, that the PBGC can properly fulfill its mission of guaranteeing private defined benefit plans. Continuing speculation about the PBGC premium increases and comparison of the PBGC to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation [FDIC] only intensifies the pressure, subsequently driving employers away from defined benefit plan sponsorship.

Another option before Congress is to try to stabilize the premium, so as not to deter plan sponsors away from the system, and instead let the Federal Government absorb the loss. This option is a reality which even the Bush administration could not deny. In the President's budget for fiscal year 1993, the administration introduced the idea of budgeting for fixed and expected future PBGC liabilities. Unfortunately, it did not include premium income in their calculations. Therefore the likely long-term impact on the budget could not be realistically assessed. But one thing is for certain, adding billions to our $4 trillion national debt is no way to help balance the budget.

Our third option is to be sure that companies fund their pension promises and promise within their means. This can be done through stricter funding rules for underfunded plans, to require the faster funding of present obligations. An additional requirement, that companies fund up their plan or put up collateral if they increase benefits, will prevent presently underfunded plans from getting worse.

It might seem cruel to force companies to promise within their means. But it is far more cruel for workers to expect a certain level of benefits when they retire, only to find out later that the money they expected to have for their retirement isn't there. After all, even the PBGC only guarantees, on average, about 80 percent of what is currently promised.

Our bill incorporates the principles embodied in the third alternative, because as one can deduce, it is the only choice that ensures a responsible national retirement income policy.

Unfortunately, there are no quick fixes or easy answers to our PBGC problem. Retirement benefits need to be paid for. Fortunately, the vast majority of companies do a great job providing for their employees and have well-funded pension plans. Many of these companies, such as Ford Motor Co., and USX Corp., compete on a daily basis with rivals who put far less into the pension plan in order to sustain the operating budgets of their company. Is it fair for some companies to do their best for employees while others play a shell game with their pension promises? These pension promises eventually need to be paid for with real money, not IOU's.

As retirees live longer they will need a sufficient amount of pension money to be assured some quality of life. All segments of society need to play a role in this endeavor. Social Security alone will not suffice. Employees at all income levels need to save. Employers need to offer pension plans and responsibly fund for what they promise to provide. Government needs to encourage adequate funding so that pension money can earn interest. Companies should not have the stress of needing to use this year's corporate earnings to pay for this year's retirees. This is especially dangerous for companies in cyclical and declining industries, with a shrinking work force.

So let's act now to enact the Pension Funding Improvement Act. Let us not wait until 10 years down the road when the Federal Government is forced to step in to examine the debris left over from the defined benefit plan system. Let's act now and send a message to America that the defined benefit plan system, and indeed our Nation's retirement income policy as a whole, needs to grow and flourish. While enactment of the Pension Funding Improvement Act is not the total answer to our country's retirement policy problems, it will greatly diminish our PBGC deficit problem by ensuring that workers have funded pensions today in order to be sure they are not a burden to their children tomorrow. It's a positive step in the right direction, deserving the serious attention of all those concerned with the future. Hopefully, all my colleagues will consider it worthy of their serious attention. •

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I am very pleased to take this opportunity to join my distinguished colleague from Vermont, Senator JEFFORDS, in cosponsoring this bill. We seek, through this bill, to limit the financial exposure of the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation [PBGC].

Mr. President, I would initially like to thank Senator JEFFORDS and extend to him my appreciation for the tremendous amount of work that he and his staff have done in the area of employee benefits legislation. I congratulate him for his leadership in a field that is of vital importance to so many Americans.

Let me begin with some background on the current problems at the PBGC. America's retirement security system is built on three pillars: Social Security, individual savings, and private pensions.

Mr. President, 10 years ago, when the Social Security system was so close to insolvency that it was borrowing money from the Medicare trust funds, we had the bipartisan courage to shore up the trust fund and ensure that Social Security would be there for our children and grandchildren.

We have learned a vital and expensive lesson from the S&L debacle that threatened the individual savings of many Americans. That lesson is this: When we see a potential disaster brewing in some area where the Government has unfunded liabilities, we must act as quickly as possible to shore up the system and prevent a problem from escalating into a catastrophe.

Had we addressed the S&L crisis early, and provided adequate financing to close down all of the bankrupt S&L's in 1986 the cost to the American taxpayer would have been less than $50 billion. But the longer we waited, the more it cost us. Now, we as a Nation are paying the price for that delay. And we will continue to do so for many years to come.

Mr. President, the third pillar of our Nation's retirement security is based upon the private pension system. When working men and women retire after a life of service to one or more companies, they often receive a pension from their employer's defined benefit plan.

In the late 1960's and early 1970's, this third pillar was in serious jeopardy. Employees who worked for 25 years were dismissed by their employers without receiving a single penny of the pension they have earned. After the failure of several well-known companies in Minnesota and across the country, including Studebaker Corp., Minneapolis Moline Corp., White Motor Freight, and others, Congress finally stepped in, and established, in 1974, enforceable vesting and fiduciary responsibilities for company pension plans.

To guarantee the promise of a pension, Congress created the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation [PBGC]. PBGC's purpose is to provide financial security for plan participants if their company and its plans fail. The PBGC collects premiums from viable defined benefit plans and takes over and administers plans that terminate when employers go out of business. Thus, in a very real sense, all working men and women who are participants in defined benefit plans rely on PBGC to guarantee the future existence of their pension plans.

Mr. President, the warning signs that PBGC is in financial trouble are everywhere. The warning lights are flashing and the buzzers are sounding much too loudly to be ignored. The U.S. Senate must act appropriately and we must act now. PBGC has a $2.5 billion deficit, which is up from $1 billion just 2 years ago. The Department of Labor estimates that if we do nothing, this deficit will grow to $18 billion by 1997.

The two largest losses have occurred recently—Pan American Airways' terminated plan was underfunded by $900 million, and Eastern Airlines' plan was underfunded by $700 million.

But what worries me the most is that the pension underfunding associated with readily identifiable troubled companies grew last year by an estimated $8 billion, to $13 billion. This constitutes a huge potential liability for PBGC, and one that could threaten our entire private pension system.

Mr. President, the Jeffords-Durenberger bill is an initial step that Congress can take to stem the further undermining of our private pension system. The problem is that under current law, companies are allowed to grant pension benefit increases to their employees without actually funding the pension plan to the extent of these increases. If the plan then terminates in this underfunded state, PBGC is fully responsible for providing these benefits, including the benefit increases.

Let me repeat that. Employers may grant pension benefit increases without adequately funding the plan, and PBGC is responsible for the promised benefits.

Mr. President, as you are well aware, America's corporate executives are very smart. They know about this rule, and I believe that they have taken advantage of the American people. Employers, especially in troubled industries, know that they cannot afford significant wage increases, and many have underfunded pension plans. So what do they do then? They provide pension benefit increases without funding them. If the company turns itself around, it ends up paying the benefits; but if it goes out of business, the PBGC is stuck with the tab.

In my view, this amounts to nothing more than a risk-free loan from the PBGC to ailing companies. Congress did not establish PBGC for this purpose, and I think that this is just plain wrong. Given the current budgetary constraints that this country faces, I see this as a risk that we can ill afford to take.

The Jeffords-Durenberger bill addresses this problem directly. The bill amends the tax code to require plans that grant benefit increases to provide security in the form of cash or a bond if the plan is less than 90-percent funded, if the employers want to grant increases, they will have to pay for them.

It hardly seems too much to ask for employers to pay for the benefits that they promise their workers. If they cannot pay for the increased benefits, then they should be honest with their employees and let them know. The PBGC, as a Federal guarantee agency, should not be the dumping ground for irresponsible employer promises.

S. 106. A bill to modernize the U.S. Customs Service; to the Committee on Finance.

CUSTOMS MODERNIZATION AND INFORMED COMPLIANCE ACT

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am introducing today a bill that is critical to the future operations of the U.S. Customs Service, as this distinguished Federal agency moves toward 200 years of service to our country.

Let me say at the outset that this bill is identical to the version passed by the last Congress. Unfortunately, the act was incorporated into the Revenue Act of 1992 which was vetoed. I am therefore inviting every Senator and Representative who supported the act in the 102d Congress to demonstrate their commitment to the improvement of our customs system by joining us as a cosponsor of this bill. I am also hoping that new Members of Congress will see the benefits for all that come from supporting this bill. Every State and district in the United States will realize a net gain in jobs, business, consumer price savings, and manufacturing productivity.

The Customs Modernization Act will allow our foreign trade community to keep apace of the unprecedented growth of our export and import system. The Mod Act, as it's referred to in this community, will provide a type of electronic, streamlined infrastructure over which the continued surge of trade will flow more smoothly.

The Mod Act benefits everyone.

Importers: Retail businesses as well as manufacturers who need imported components for integration into products for domestic or foreign sale.

Consumers: There will be a better choice of available goods at lower prices, keeping household budgets more stable.

Exporters: Faster processing of foreign-bound goods allowing for a quicker recovery of investments, settlement of bills of lading, and improved market access abroad.

Mr. President, I am convinced that the Clinton Presidency will be no less committed to the expansion of trade than the previous administration. I am therefore inviting my colleagues to join me in registering our support for this bill as evidence of the Senate's strong bipartisan commitment to the expansion of our economy through trade and trade-related production and employment.

Mr. President, I believe that we will continue this country's progress toward still greater trade development in the next 4 years. I see progress in such landmark agreements as the Uruguay round of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade; the North American Free-Trade Agreement; a Chilean Free-Trade Agreement; and other agreements with such likely candidates as Argentina, as well as improved trade relations with China, Japan, the European Community, and the South and Southeast Asian regions.

At the moment, without the streamlining provided in the Mod Act, we actually lag behind Europe, Korea, and many other regions and countries in customs processing. Think of it, the nation that conceived, developed, and raised computer-based management systems to new heights actually trails newcomers to these technologies. It is inexcusable, and a regrettable self-condemnation of foot-dragging. More importantly, it undermines efficiency that contributes to economies of the firm in foreign trade, as I mentioned earlier in this statement. It impedes competitiveness, in other words.

For these reasons, the bill enjoys widespread support from a broad coalition of importers, carriers, brokers, and other industries. In the last Congress, we answered the demands of everyone, even small brokers who sought extensions of time for adopting electronic cargo processing procedures. But we are willing to go still further and will entertain any objection when this bill is received in committee.

We need the Mod Act to ensure this country's rightful place in the world trade community.

Mr. President, I thank you for your consideration.

S. 107. A bill to mandate a study of the effectiveness of the national drug strategy and to provide for an accounting of funds devoted to its implementation, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

STUDY OF THE EFFECTIVENESS OF THE NATIONAL DRUG STRATEGY

• Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, in the fall of 1990, I noted that the Congress has never mandated a comprehensive examination of our antidrug efforts to identify the most useful, cost-efficient methods. I made the same point on the first day of the 102d Congress. Today, as the 103d Congress commences, I reintroduce a bill to require such a study.

In 1988 I cochaired a Democratic Working Group on drug policy with our esteemed colleague Senator NUNN. The Group developed a comprehensive approach which was written into law as the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988. This bill distinguished between the problems of supply and demand for illegal drugs. Significantly, it emphasized demand.

I have long been skeptical of anti-drug programs that place primary emphasis on an attempt to interrupt the supply of drugs. To be sure, antismuggling programs have their place, but as long as there is significant demand, restricting the supply has the adverse effect of making the drug business more profitable for those who succeed in circumventing the law. There will always be those who try.

The point here is that the plan proposed by the Democratic Working Group embodied a broad approach. It included law enforcement and interdiction, but also emphasized the importance of providing treatment on request or application.

In 1990, the administration issued a white paper which, for all intents and purposes, rejected the specific, legislatively mandated goal of providing treatment on request. Former drug czar William Bennett said that he thought it was not sensible to put those seeking treatment in the driver's seat. Nevermind the fact that Congress wrote that goal into the law.

In December of last year, I delivered the Norman E. Zinberg Lecture at the John F. Kennedy School for Government at Harvard University. There, I noted that our 1988 legislation had a brief half-life. Bennett was followed by a political appointment with no apparent views on the subject. Dr. Herbert D. Kleber, the Deputy Director for Demand—a position established by the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988—left after 2 years, and his position was never filled by the administration. Nor was support for treatment as forthcoming as the legislation indicated it ought to be.

The recent administration's hostility toward treatment on request is all the more reason that we should conduct a thorough, nonpartisan, scientific review of what actually works—dollar for dollar—and what does not. As we approach the $10 billion level in annual drug program appropriations, it is time that we ask the simple question: "What works?"

Research was an important part of the recent administration's drug strategy. But we need a comprehensive review of all our efforts. If we are to succeed—especially in this time of fiscal constraint—in reducing the level of epidemic drug addiction in the United States, then we need to compare the various possible approaches and make intelligent, informed choices among the competing priorities. The study mandated by this legislation in the sine qua non of making these choices is an intelligent manner.

This bill would require the Secretary of Health and Human Services to arrange for the National Academy of Sciences to conduct this study. It also provides for an annual audit report of our drug programs by the General Accounting Office. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of this legislation be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. FINDINGS.

The Congress finds that—

(1) there is great disagreement concerning the causes of the problem of epidemic drug addiction in the United States and about the most effective way to reduce it;

(2) one of the factors which most inhibits an effective response to the problem of epidemic drug addiction in the United States is the lack of accurate information concerning both the problem and the specific effectiveness of each individual element of the Nation's antidrug effort;

(3) evaluating the effectiveness of the individual elements of the Federal program to reduce epidemic drug abuse requires accurately establishing cause and effect relationship concerning drug addiction;

(4) the United States has promulgated a National Drug Strategy pursuant to the requirements of the 1988 Anti-Drug Abuse Act and will devote many billions of dollars to antidrug programs for many years to come; and

(5) it is in the interests of the Nation that these funds be spent as effectively as possible and that a permanent mechanism exist to audit their expenditure.

SEC. 2. PURPOSES.

The purposes of this Act are to—

(1) require a study of the effectiveness of federally funded antidrug programs; and

(2) create a permanent auditing mechanism for federally funded antidrug programs.

SEC. 3. STUDY OF ANTI-DRUG PROGRAMS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary of Health and Human Services (referred to in this Act as the "Secretary") shall enter into appropriate arrangements with the National Academy of Sciences to conduct a comprehensive study and investigation of the effectiveness in reducing drug addiction of the various components of the Federal antidrug program, including—

- (1) crop eradication;
- (2) crop substitution;
- (3) support for foreign law enforcement;
- (4) interdiction, including a separate analysis of the effectiveness of the military services in the interdiction effort;
- (5) education;
- (6) treatment;
- (7) support for local law enforcement;
- (8) criminal justice system reforms; and
- (9) research, including a separate analysis of effectiveness of pharmacological research and research into other types of medical treatments for drug addiction.

(b) METHODOLOGY.—The study described in subsection (a) shall to the maximum extent possible—

(1) study control for the effects of broad societal changes unrelated to specific antidrug initiatives, such as changing demographic patterns;

(2) separate the effects of such component of the Federal antidrug program from the effects of other antidrug initiatives;

(3) consider the extent to which the expenditure of Federal funds on job training, education, and other health, education, and welfare programs contribute to reducing epidemic drug addiction;

(4) study the cost-effectiveness of each component of the Federal antidrug program, as well as the programs described in paragraph (3); and

(5) take into account the social and demographic factors which influence rates and forms of epidemic drug addiction and provide, where possible, information on the effectiveness of the various components of the Federal antidrug program on various demographic subgroups within the population.

(c) REPORTING.—In conducting the study described in subsection (a), the National Academy of Sciences shall provide to the Secretary and the Congress—

(1) not later than 6 months after the date of enactment of this Act a detailed written description of the manner in which the study will be conducted, including a specific set of goals for the study;

(2) not later than 18 months after the date of enactment of this Act the preliminary results of the study; and

(3) not later than 2 years after the date of enactment of this Act the final results of the study.

(d) UPDATE OF STUDY.—The Secretary shall enter into appropriate arrangements with the National Academy of Sciences to update the results of the study described in subsection (a) every 2 years following the initial report.

(e) ASSISTANCE FROM FEDERAL AGENCIES.—Agencies of the Federal Government shall provide to the National Academy of Sciences such information as it may reasonably request for the purpose of conducting the study described in subsection (a).

SEC. 4. AUDIT BY THE GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTING OFFICE.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The Government Accounting Office shall provide to the Congress on an annual basis an audit report concerning the management and expenditures of the component parts of the Federal antidrug program.

(b) SEPARATE COMPONENTS.—The report described in (a) shall contain a separate section on each of the component parts of the Federal antidrug program.

(c) ACCESS TO RECORDS.—In order to carry out the purposes of this section, the Comptroller General shall have such access to records, files, personnel, and facilities of the Federal agencies involved in the Federal antidrug program, including the military and intelligence services, as the Comptroller General considers necessary.●

S. 108. A bill to prohibit the importation of semiautomatic assault weapons, large capacity ammunition feeding devices, and certain accessories; to the Committee on Finance.

PROHIBITING IMPORTATION OF SEMIAUTOMATIC ASSAULT WEAPONS AND AMMUNITION

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, today I rise to introduce a bill to ban permanently the importation of certain assault weapons and accessories, such as large-capacity ammunition belts and rifle magazines. Representative GIBBONS, the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Trade Subcommittee, will introduce a similar bill in the House. In the 101st and 102d Congresses we introduced similar measures, as well.

On March 14, 1989, President Bush announced a ban on the import of certain semiautomatic rifles, such as the Uzi and AK-47. He then extended the ban to include all similar foreign-made weapons on April 5, 1989, pending a review by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms. On July 7, 1989, ATF released its report, which recommended that the ban continue. And so it has, now for well over 3 years.

The Executive's authority to ban these weapons derives from the Gun Control Act of 1968, which provides that the Secretary of the Treasury "shall authorize a firearm * * * to be imported or brought into the United States." I, along with Representative GIBBONS and most Americans, applauded the President for having taken the leadership in this sensitive issue. But the ban ought to be made permanent by legislation.

The report of the ATF Working Group on the Importability of Certain Semiautomatic Rifles was unequivocal. It concluded:

These semiautomatic assault rifles were designed and intended to be particularly suitable for combat rather than sporting applications. While these weapons can be used, and indeed may be used by some, for hunting and target shooting, we believe it is clear that they are not generally recognized as particularly suitable for these purposes.

The purpose of section 925(d)(3) [Gun Control Act of 1968, Title 18, U.S.C.] was to make a limited exception to the general prohibition on the importation of firearms, to preserve the sportsman's right to sporting firearms. This decision will in no way preclude the importation of true sporting firearms. It will only prevent the importation of military-style firearms which, although popular among some gun owners for collection, self-defense, combat competitions, or plinking, simply cannot be fairly characterized as sporting rifles.

The assault weapons listed in this bill are those listed by ATF as military-style guns.

Why these guns and not some others, which may take as many or more innocent lives? Semiautomatic firearms differ in at least one important way: they are capable of firing a large number of cartridges in a short period of time. An Uzi can fire 30 rounds in 5 seconds. Patrick Edward Purdy, the gunman who killed 5 children and wounded 29 others in Stockton, CA, fired over 100 rounds in 2 minutes. This bill would also ban the importation of ammunition belts or magazines which could hold more than five rounds.

These are also the favorite weapons of drug dealers. Even teenagers now carry guns better left in the hands of professional soldiers. Police officers are outgunned by the assault weapons. Innocent lives are threatened by the spray of bullets these guns produce. It should not be surprising that the National Association of Police Organizations, the U.S. Conference of Mayors, and the American Bar Association, among others, support a ban on assault weapons.

I, too, support a ban on assault weapons, but I believe that the codification of the current import ban is a necessary first step. I hope that my colleagues will concur.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 109. A bill to amend section 923 of title 18, United States Code, to require the keeping of records with respect to dispositions of ammunition, and to require a study of the use and possible regulation of sales of ammunition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RECORDS ON DISPOSITION OF AMMUNITION

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a measure to improve our information about the regulation and criminal use of ammunition. This bill, identical to one I introduced in the last Congress, has two components. It would require importers and manufacturers of ammunition to keep records and submit an annual report to the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms [BATF] on the disposition of ammunition, including the amount, caliber, and type of ammunition imported or manufactured. It would also require the Secretary of the Treasury, in consultation with the National Academy of Sciences, to conduct a study of ammunition use and make recommendations on the efficacy of reducing crime by restricting access to ammunition.

While there are enough handguns in circulation to last well into the twenty-second century, there is only a 4-year supply of ammunition according to the best estimate. But how much of what kind of ammunition, where does it come from, and where does it go? There are currently no reporting requirements for manufacturers and importers of ammunition—earlier reporting requirements were repealed in 1986. The Federal Bureau of Investigation's annual uniform crime reports, based on information provided by local law enforcement agencies, does not record the caliber, type, or amount of ammunition used in crime. In short, our data base is woefully inadequate.

I support the Brady bill, which requires a waiting period before the purchase of a handgun, and have supported bills to stem the flow of automatic and semiautomatic firearms to criminals. But while the debate over gun control continues, I offer another alternative: ammunition control. After all, guns do not kill people, bullets do.

Ammunition control while a new idea, is not unknown. In 1982, Phil Caruso of the Patrolmen's Benevolent Association asked me to do something about armor-piercing bullets. Jacketed in tungsten or other materials, these rounds penetrated four police flak jackets and five Los Angeles County telephone books. They are of doubtful sporting value. I introduced legislation, the Law Enforcement Officers Protection Act, to ban the cop-killer bullets in the 97th, 98th, and 99th Congresses. It enjoyed the overwhelming endorsement of groups and tacit support from the National Rifle Association, and was finally signed into law by President Reagan on August 28, 1986.

Local jurisdictions are aware of the benefits to be gained from ammunition control. The District of Columbia and some other cities prohibit a person from possessing ammunition without a valid license for a firearm of the same caliber or gauge as the ammunition. Beginning in 1990, the city of Los Angeles banned the sale of all ammunition 1 week prior to Independence Day and New Year's Day in an effort to reduce injuries and deaths caused by the firing of guns into the air.

Such efforts, while well-meaning and effective, are isolated attempts to solve a national problem. We need to do more, but to do so, we need information to guide policymaking. This bill fills the need by requiring annual reports to BATF by manufacturers and importers and directing a study by the National Academy of Sciences. I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this measure and ask unanimous consent that its full text be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. RECORDS OF DISPOSITION OF AMMUNITION.

(a) AMENDMENT OF TITLE 18, UNITED STATES CODE.—Section 923(g) of title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in paragraph (1)(A) by inserting after the second sentence "Each licensed importer and manufacturer of ammunition shall maintain such records of importation, production, shipment, sale, or other disposition of ammunition at his place of business for such period and in such form as the Secretary may by regulations prescribe. Such records shall include the amount, caliber, and type of ammunition."; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(6) Each licensed importer or manufacturer of ammunition shall annually prepare a summary report of imports, production, shipments, sales, and other dispositions during the preceding year. The report shall be prepared on a form specified by the Secretary, shall include the amounts, calibers, and types of ammunition that were disposed of, and shall be forwarded to the office specified thereon not later than the close of business on the date specified by the Secretary."

(b) STUDY OF CRIMINAL USE AND REGULATION OF AMMUNITION.—The Secretary of the Treasury shall request the National Academy of Sciences to—

(1) prepare, in consultation with the Secretary, a study of the criminal use and regulation of ammunition; and

(2) to submit to Congress, not later than July 31, 1996, a report with recommendations on the potential for preventing crime by regulating or restricting the availability of ammunition.

By Mr. MOYNIHAN:

S. 110. A bill to require the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency to seek advice concerning environmental risks, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

ENVIRONMENTAL RISK REDUCTION ACT

• Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, environmental decisions are difficult in any circumstance, and especially so when the economy is weak and there is competition for resources both in the private sector and Government. People want a clean environment, but they don't want to pay more than is necessary. We can't do everything at once. The question of priorities arises almost unbidden. We would rather not have to think this way, but there you are. The choice is not between having priorities or not having them. Rather it is between setting them consciously or setting them by default. Thus, I rise today to introduce a bill that seeks to establish the framework needed to ensure that information needed by an informed and involved public to set workable priorities. This legislation, the Environmental Risk Reduction Act of 1993, is an update of the Environmental Risk Reduction Act of 1991.

I am convinced that risk ranking and cost-benefit analyses are valuable tools for making environmental decisions.

They offer the means to set priorities and to measure success. They are not our only tools, but nor can they be ignored. It took over half a century for the dedicated public servants in the Bureau of Labor Statistics and the Council of Economic Advisors to learn how to fashion economic indicators. It will no doubt take a long time to develop reliable methodology to assess costs and benefits of environmental regulations, and to reliably measure the risks associated with environmental exposures. But this is no reason not to begin. If we don't start now we will never learn. And it must not be forgotten that there are some things that science cannot tell us. Values, for instance: Do we care more about this species or that one? Or fairness. Some questions are a matter for the legal system, not the scientists.

But we do have problems. During the Presidential campaign and transition, much discussion focused on the economy, getting and keeping it going. Dr. Paul Portney of Resources for the Future testified at a hearing last September on my bill S. 2132, the Environmental Risk Reduction Act that compliance with environmental laws was about $130 billion per year—something like 2.2 percent of GNP. Our next closest competitors in terms of environmental protection, perhaps not surprisingly, are Germany and Japan, each spending about 1.6 to 1.8 percent of GNP. While this may not be too much money to spend on environmental protection it is too much to spend unwisely.

Obviously, we are seeing a new trend. Federal environmental laws are being questioned. State and local governments are signaling that they can't afford to comply with all environmental laws. Their resources are finite and must make do for competing needs; for example, maintaining roads and buildings, providing social services, and schooling.

Dr. Edward Hayes of the Ohio State University testified last September before the Committee on Environment and Public Works about the experience in his State. The city of Columbus, OH, recently set out to analyze with as much precision as possible the impact of Federal environmental laws during recent years. City leaders wanted to know what effect those changes would have on the city's budget. The findings were reported in "Environmental Legislation: The Increasing Costs of Regulatory Compliance to the city of Columbus." It turns out that new environmental initiatives will cost the city of Columbus an additional $1.6 billion over the next decade—an extra $856 per year of increased local fees or taxes for every household in the city by the year 2000. A followup study, "Ohio Metropolitan Area Cost Report for Environmental Compliance," showed a similar impact in eight other Ohio cities.

As far as we can tell this pattern is being repeated in other places. Just other places. Just this week a bipartisan group of 114 mayors from towns and cities across the United States sent each Member of Congress a letter and report warning of an impending fiscal crisis in trying to pay for the increasing costs of environmental mandates. The President and Vice President were sent a copy of the letter and report when they took office yesterday. The editorial in the January 8 issue of Science alerts us to the "growing questioning of the factual basis for Federal command and control actions," all because of concerns over regulatory costs.

The message is clear. State and local governments will hold the Congress and EPA more accountable in the future about obligating them to spend their resources on Federal requirements. They will want proof that there is a problem and confidence that the legislated solutions will solve it. California's threat to give enforcement of its drinking water program back to EPA last spring speaks volumes. The most environmentally advanced State in the Union close to rebellion—a sobering prospect. The Science editorial suggests that we are seeing the "beginning of a revolt."

Clearly risk ranking and cost-benefit analyses aren't the sole factors for decisionmaking. Social concerns—who should bear risk for whose benefit—public preference, basic fairness must be considered, too. Truth be told, I suspect that environmental decisions have been based more on feelings than on facts. This is understandable in a prescientific field, but we are being overtaken by events. The questions that are key to making decisions about the environment are slowly but surely becoming more knowable.

There are those who discount relative risk ranking entirely because the assumptions needed to assess risk are myriad. Facts often seem scarce. What are we exposed to? What results does this produce? What portion of the population is affected? Or might be affected? There are no precise answers to these questions. And so risk assessments are controversial, at times very controversial. But we cannot forget that knowledge need not be precise to be useful.

Relative risk ranking and cost benefit analyses are tools. Crude tools today, yes, but perhaps they are sufficient in some cases to rank activity "A" as more risky than activity "B." If costs or political realities dictate that we should control "B" before "A", then great. But let us have the courage and foresight to make a conscious decision, in public, with people watching. History shows that crude tools give way to more refined ones. Experience teaches.

I'm introducing the Environmental Risk Reduction Act, to help us learn how best to practice the trades of environmental risk assessment and cost/benefit analyses. The bill will put into law the major findings of the 1990 "Reducing Risk" report by EPA's Science Advisory Board [SAB]. I agree with former EPA Administrator William Reilly's belief that science can lend much needed coherence, order, and integrity to costly and controversial decisions.

American's environmental laws are a large and diverse lot. We have only two decades of experience on this subject, and we are still learning, feeling our way. The relative risk ranking and cost/benefit analyses called for in this bill provide some common ground for looking at our environmental laws. The bill also provides the public and Congress with access to the findings. The "Reducing Risk" report states that "relative risk data and risk assessment techniques should inform (the public) judgment as much as possible." Not dictate it, but inform it.

All this will take time, decades perhaps. But let us take heart. Questions that seem difficult now can with a certain amount of effort yield to the scientific method.

I urge my colleagues to support this bill and ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill and the Science editorial be printed in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the material ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Environmental Risk Reduction Act of 1993".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND POLICY.

(a) FINDINGS.—Congress finds that—

(1) the cost of protecting the quality of the environment currently exceeds $115,000,000,000 per year;

(2) providing protection to a continually increasing population from the deleterious effects of global climatic change, stratospheric ozone depletion, the loss of biological diversity, and waste products will result in increases in the cost referred to in paragraph (1);

(3) although the cost referred to in paragraph (1) is not necessarily excessive, the amount is too substantial for the funds to be used ineffectively or inefficiently;

(4) there is a need to coordinate the development and implementation of environmental policies among policymakers of the Federal Government and the governments of States and political subdivisions of States;

(5) a key role of the Federal Government in the development of environmental policy is to support research to upgrade environmental science and engineering;

(6) ecological resources are extraordinarily valuable, and risks to the resources either directly or indirectly degrade human health and the economy;

(7) the most effective use of the funds referred to in paragraph (1) would—

(A) protect the greatest number of individuals from the most harm; and

(B) be supported by a public perception that subparagraph (A) is being carried out;

(8) pollution prevention and toxic use reduction are preferred techniques for environmental protection;

(9) the techniques referred to in paragraph (8)—

(A) should be considered, if feasible, in decisions related to environmental protection; and

(B) have recognized limitations, as some environmental hazards cannot be ameliorated through the use of the techniques;

(10) the ranking of relative risk is another important technique for environmental protection;

(11) the determination of safety is a social construct instead of a scientific one, and is based more on the values of individual control and social equity than on the knowledge of a defined risk;

(12) notwithstanding paragraph (11), scientific information plays an essential role in supporting environmental decisions by policymakers, as members of the general public use scientific information to understand the likelihood, nature, and magnitude of potential risks;

(13) it is necessary to maintain a clear conceptual distinction between the techniques of risk assessment and risk management;

(14) a risk assessment should—

(A) be the most accurate and informative quantitative evaluation of risk that is practicable to conduct; and

(B) include a statement of important identifiable uncertainties;

(15) risk management is a political process as well as a technical one;

(16) risk management integrates the findings of a risk assessment with other considerations, such as economic considerations, legislative mandates, and the level of public concern;

(17) good risk management requires a reliable and strictly objective risk assessment;

(18) the ranking of relative risks to human health, welfare, and ecological resources is a complex task, and is best performed by technical experts who do not have interests that could bias objective judgment;

(19) applying technology and resources to address the highest ranked risks within the intent of existing environmental laws and identifying highly ranked risks not addressed by law can significantly reduce risks to human health, welfare, and ecological resources;

(20) some populations of special concern appear to have a greater degree of sensitivity to environmental hazards, including pregnant women and fetuses, children, the elderly, chronically ill individuals, and individuals with certain racial and genetic characteristics;

(21) better risk assessment methodologies and a long-term commitment to collecting monitoring data on the condition of ecological resources and exposure of humans and ecosystems to pollutants are necessary to ensure—

(A) the identification of the greatest risks to human health and the environment; and

(B) that environmental laws are applied in such manner as to accomplishing the intended results of the laws;

(22) ranking risks must be an ongoing process and must reflect improvements in environmental data and scientific understanding;

(23) the Administrator needs a major national data base concerning environmental hazards to aid in the adjustment of priorities and programs to direct resources to ensure success in efforts to address the hazards;

(24) the environmental monitoring and assessment program created under this Act provides the functional equivalent of an environmental statistics program;

(25) although the National Academy of Sciences has documented flaws in the administration and management of the environmental monitoring and assessment program of the Agency in an interim report issued June 1992, the flaws can be addressed through improvements in the program, and more time is needed to address the flaws; and

(26) effective and efficient strategies to reduce risks must quantify significant costs and benefits to the greatest extent possible.

(b) POLICY.—It is the policy of the United States that—

(1) the environmental protection activities administered by the Administrator shall attain the greatest risk reduction possible with the resources available to the Administrator; and

(2) the ability to reduce risks requires—
(A) accurate, quantitative estimates of the exposure of humans and ecosystems to all important risk factors;

(B) accurate techniques for predicting the effects of the exposure referred to in subparagraph (A);

(C) an adequate understanding of technical, economic, social, and legal alternatives to achieve a reduction in exposure to risk factors; and

[From Science, Jan. 8, 1993]

REGULATORY COSTS

On 20 January, the Democrats became sole heirs to a phenomenon of regulation gone amok. In April 1992, 59 regulatory agencies with about 125,000 employees were at work on 4,186 pending regulations. The cost during 1991 of mandates already in place has been estimated at $542 billion. The fastest growing component of costs is environmental regulations, which amounted to $115 billion in 1991 but are slated to grow by more than 50 percent in constant dollars by the year 2000.

Twenty years ago, costs of federal environmental regulations were not visible to the public. However, the number and stringency of unfunded federal requirements have since increased markedly. New and tighter regulations have drained funds from cities, towns, school districts, and individuals. A result is the beginning of a revolt. There is a growing questioning of the factual basis for federal command and control actions and of the scientific competence of the regulators.

Two examples will be cited. Nine participating cities in Ohio have made an important, detailed study of impacts on them of 14 environmental regulations or issues. They estimate their compliance costs (1992 to 2001) at about $3 billion. One of the cities, Columbus, had a budget of $591 million in 1991, of which $62 million went to environmental compliance. Projected compliance costs in 1995 are $107 million (1991 dollars). Faced with difficult funding choices, Mayor Greg Lashutka decided that Columbus should create its own Environmental Science Advisory Committee. The mayor had rich scientific resources including Ohio State University, Battelle, Columbus, and Chemical Abstracts. Edward F. Hayes, Vice President for Research of Ohio State University, was named chairman of the committee.

Hayes has questioned the judgment inherent in some of the federal command and control regulations. As one example he cited the Safe Drinking Water Act, which requires that at least 133 specified pollutants be monitored. Many of the substances are not present in significant quantities in Ohio. In other instances, mandated regulatory levels are extremely tight. He cited the herbicide Atrazine. Although its average level at water intakes is far below 3 parts per billion, the city may be required to install "best available technology" for Atrazine removal at a cost of $80 million for each of two surface water plants. Hayes has stated that the action level is 3 parts per billion because effects of massive doses to rats are extrapolated to infinitesimal doses in humans, and regulators included a thousandfold factor of safety. If the factor of safety were set at 100, then a major uncertainty would be removed, and Columbus would be more free to address real health problems in the community.

Another example of questioning of the judgment of federal regulators involves the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) and its proposal to limit levels of radon in drinking water to 300 picocuries per liter. The EPA estimated that the cost to achieve this standard nationwide would be $1.6 billion in capital costs and additional annual expenses of $180 million. The Association of California Water Agencies (ACWA) found that the cost for meeting the radon water standard in California alone would approach $3.7 billion. National costs were estimated at $12 to $20 billion, and only 1 percent of the public radon exposure would be reduced. The ACWA lined up support from 27 California members of the House of Representatives. A letter dispatched to President Bush and signed by them included: "We are deeply concerned about new regulations which place a considerable financial burden on our citizens without providing appreciable public benefit."

Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan (D-NY) has been aware of deficiencies at EPA. In the 102nd session of Congress he introduced S. 2132, a bill designed "To require the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency to seek ongoing advice from independent experts in ranking relative environmental risks; to conduct the research and monitoring necessary to ensure a sound scientific basis for decision-making; and to use such information in managing available resources to protect society from the greatest risks to human health, welfare, and ecological resources." The bill was not acted on, but a modified version will be introduced in the new Congress and should receive widespread support.—PHILIP H. ABELSON.●

By Mr. MOYNIHAN:

S. 111. A bill to amend title IV of the Social Security Act to direct the Secretary of Health and Human Services to develop and implement an information gathering system to permit the measurement, analysis, and reporting of welfare dependency; to the Committee on Finance.

WELFARE DEPENDENCY ACT

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Welfare Dependency Act of 1993. The purpose of the bill, which is directly modeled on the Employment Act of 1946, is to declare it the policy and the responsibility of the Federal Government to strengthen families and promote their self-sufficiency. To this end, the bill directs the Secretary of Health and Human Services to conduct a study to determine which statistics, if collected and analyzed on a regular basis, would be most useful in tracking and predicting welfare dependency. Within 2 years, the Secretary would report the conclusions to Congress, and, a year later, would submit a first report on dependency. Thereafter, reports would be submitted annually. These reports would include annual numerical goals for recipients and expenditures within each public welfare program. For the interim, the bill establishes a goal of reducing dependency to 10 percent of families with children.

For the first time in American history the largest proportion of persons in poverty are to be found among children, not among adults or among the aged. This is new. When we first began to notice this trend in the 1960's, it seemed that we had discovered something uniquely American. Then we began to get the returns of the Luxembourg Income Survey. Children, it seems, are poorer than adults in all manner of places: Australia, Canada, Germany, England, as well as the United States. For too long we have been trying to measure a postindustrial phenomenon—dependency—with statistics designed to track industrial-era phenomena.

We used to know something about how to predict welfare dependency. In the early 1960's when I was Assistant Secretary in the Department of Labor for Policy, Planning, and Research, we found that there was an extraordinary correlation between male unemployment and new welfare cases from the period starting in 1946 up to about 1958-59. Then the correlation weakened, until finally in 1963 the lines crossed and the relationship became negative—the lower the unemployment rate, the higher the number of AFDC cases. Now, even during prosperous periods for our Nation, a shockingly high percentage of our children are dependent on public support.

We do have some data on the magnitude of this problem, if not its origins. Back in the 1960's the Office of Economic Opportunity had the good sense to put up money for a longitudinal study of families at the Institute for Social Research at the University of Michigan. The researchers computed the incidence of welfare dependency among children born in the late 1960's. The findings are dismaying. Almost one quarter—22.1 percent—of these children were dependent on AFDC for at least 1 year before reaching their 18th birthday. That's 72.3 percent of black and 15.7 percent of nonblack children.

But these findings on the extent of the problem tell us little about what causes it or how to address it. Certainly some part of this explosion in welfare dependency can be attributed to changes in family structure. Three decades ago there was nothing notably amiss with the traditional family. American divorce rates were high, but stabilizing. The traditional family of parents with children was the norm. As recently as 1970, 40 percent of the Nation's households were made up of a married couple with one or more children. The proportion dropped to 31 percent in the next decade. It is now around a quarter of all families. Simultaneously, the proportion of families headed by a single mother has exploded. In 1970, 11.5 percent of all families with children were headed by a single mother. In 1980, 19.4 percent. In 1990, 24.2 percent. Now a quarter of all live births are out of wedlock.

Our data collection needs to become more systematic and institutionalized. As we did earlier in this century for the problem of unemployment when we enacted the Employment Act of 1946, we need to define welfare dependency as a national problem and to begin to measure, analyze, and address it. Since enactment of the Employment Act of 1946 unemployment has hardly disappeared but neither is it ignored, much less denied. I am introducing this bill on the first day of the new Congress because I believe that its passage would represent one of the most important moments in social welfare policy since Aid for Families with Dependent Children was enacted as part of the Social Security Act of 1935.

I am happy to say that a virtually identical measure was included in the Revenue Act of 1992 which passed the Senate on October 8, 1992. I urge my colleagues to again pass this measure, which fell as a result of the President's veto of the Revenue Act.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 111

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Welfare Dependency Act of 1993".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND POLICY.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds:

(1) In the period since 1960 the average annual caseload of the aid to families with dependent children program (hereafter referred to in this section as "AFDC") under title IV of the Social Security Act has quintupled.

(2) In 1990 there were on average almost twice as many households receiving AFDC payments as the number of households and individuals receiving unemployment compensation benefits.

(3) Nearly one-quarter of children born in the period 1967 through 1969 were on welfare (AFDC) before reaching age 18. For minority children this ratio approached three-quarters.

(4) At any given time one-quarter of school children are from single parent families, or households with neither parent. The National Assessment of Educational Progress has documented the educational losses associated with single parent or no parent households.

(5) Only one-quarter of father-absent families receive full child support and over one-half receive none.

(6) The average AFDC benefit has declined by more than one-third since 1960.

(7) The burden of welfare dependency is an issue of necessary concern to women, who in overwhelming proportion are the heads of single parent families.

(8) The rate of welfare dependency may be rising. However, the statistical basis on which to assess this national issue is wholly inadequate, much as the statistical basis for addressing issues of unemployment was inadequate prior to the Employment Act of 1946, which required the creation of the annual economic report of the President and the development of unemployment rates.

(b) CONGRESSIONAL POLICY.—The Congress hereby declares that—

(1) it is the policy and responsibility of the Federal Government to reduce welfare dependency to the lowest possible level, and to assist families toward self-sufficiency, consistent with other essential national goals;

(2) it is the policy of the United States to strengthen families, to ensure that children grow up in families that are economically self-sufficient and to underscore the responsibility of parents to support their children;

(3) the Federal Government should help welfare recipients as well as individuals at risk of welfare dependency to improve their education and job skills, to obtain access to necessary support services, and to take such other steps as may assist them to meet their responsibilities to become financially independent; and

(4) it is the purpose of this Act to aid in lowering welfare dependency by providing the public with generally accepted measures of welfare dependency so that the public can track dependency over time and determine whether progress is being made in reducing welfare dependency and enabling families to be self-sufficient.

SEC. 3. MEASUREMENT AND REPORTING OF WELFARE DEPENDENCY.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Title IV of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 601 et seq.) is amended by inserting after section 413 the following new section:

"MEASUREMENT AND REPORTING OF WELFARE DEPENDENCY"

"(6) DETAIL OF FEDERAL EMPLOYEES.—The Secretary shall detail, without reimbursement, any of the personnel of the Department of Health and Human Services to the Board to assist the Board in carrying out its duties. "(8) TERMINATION OF BOARD.—The Board shall be terminated at such time as the Secretary determines the duties described in paragraph (4) have been completed, but in any case prior to the submission of the first report required under subsection (c).

"(E) annual numerical goals for recipients, and expenditures, within each program and within significant subgroups within the population, for the calendar year in which the report is transmitted and for each of the following 4 calendar years, which goals shall, consistent with other essential national goals, reflect the objectives of—

"(i) reducing welfare dependency to the lowest possible level; and

"(ii) increasing family self-sufficiency at or above the Federal poverty level to the greatest extent possible;

"(F)(i) the programs and policies as the Secretary, in consultation with the Board, determines are necessary to meet the goals for each of the 5 years; and

"(G) interim goals for reducing the proportion of children, and families with children, who are recipients of aid to families with dependent children to 10 percent of families with children, adjusted for economic conditions.

"(4) SUBMISSION.—The Secretary shall submit such a report not later than 3 years after the date of the enactment of this section, and annually thereafter, to the committees specified in subsection (a)(2)(C). By Mr. MOYNIHAN:

S. 112. A bill to establish the Hudson River Artists National Historical Park in the State of New York, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

THOMAS COLE NATIONAL HISTORIC SITE

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to introduce a bill that would place the home and studio of Thomas Cole under the care of the National Park Service as a national historic site. Thomas Cole founded the American artistic tradition known as the Hudson River School. He painted landscapes of the American wilderness as it never had been depicted, untamed and majestic, the way Americans saw it in the 1830's and 1840's. His students and followers included Frederick Church, Alfred Bierstadt, Thomas Moran, and John Frederick Kensett.

No description of Cole's works would do them justice, so let me just say that their moody, dramatic style and subject matter bore sharp contrast to the pastoral European landscapes that Americans had previously admired. The new country was just settled enough that some people had time and resources to devote to collecting art. Cole's new style coincided with this growing interest, to the benefit of both.

Cole began his painting career in Manhattan, but one day took a steamboat up the Hudson for inspiration. It worked. The landscapes he saw set him on the artistic course that became his life's work. He eventually moved to a house up the river in Catskill, where he in turn boarded, owned, married, and raised his family. That house, known as Cedar Grove, remained in the Cole family until 1979, when it was put up for sale. Three art collectors saved it from developers, and now the Thomas Cole Foundation is offering to donate the house to the Park Service.

In addition to designating the Cole house a national historic site, the Secretary of the Interior would be allowed to acquire at no cost some surrounding lands now owned by the State of New York which include some of the landscapes depicted by Thomas Cole and disciples. Such an area would be known as the Hudson River Artists National Historic Park, and would be as large as 19,000 acres.

Mr. President, the home of one of the most influential 19th century American painters is being offered as a donation. I believe we owe it to him, and to the many people who admire the Hudson River School and explore its origins, to accept this offer and designate it a national historic site.

I regret that none of Thomas Cole's work hangs in the Capitol, although two works by Bierstadt can be found in the stairwell outside the Speaker's lobby. Perhaps Cole's greatest work is the four-part Voyage of Life, an allegorical series that depicts man in the four stages of life. It can be found in the National Gallery, along with two other Cole paintings. The National Gallery recently had a major exhibition of works by Church, who was Cole's first student.

I urge my colleagues to seek out these and other works from the Hudson River School. They are proof enough of Cole's importance and the need to add his home to the list of National Historic Sites.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of my bill be printed at the conclusion of these remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEC. 7. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as are necessary to carry out this Act. •

By Mr. MOYNIHAN (for himself and Mr. CHAFEE):

S. 113. A bill to amend title 18, United States Code, to require that persons comply with State and local firearms licensing laws before receiving a Federal license to deal in firearms; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

COMPLIANCE WITH STATE AND LOCAL FIREARMS LICENSING LAWS

• Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a bill to prevent the issuance of a Federal license to deal in firearms unless the applicant has a State and local license for the same purpose. I introduced this bill in the 102d Congress and am hopeful that with all the recent publicity that this loophole has received in the press and in the media, that we will pass the measure.

We are a gun-saturated society, and we must begin to deal effectively with the firearms epidemic that exists in our country. In December 1992, the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms [BATF] reported that 1 in 4 guns in New York and 1 in 3 from the District of Columbia actually comes from Virginia. The Governor of the Commonwealth has studied these facts and now seeks to implement laws to rectify this problem.

And so we too must closely scrutinize our firearms laws and, like Virginia's Gov. L. Douglas Wilder, take appropriate action. I am proposing that we do just that.

Our streets are riddled with crime involving guns, and many of the guns are possessed illegally. Too often these illegal firearms get to the street from people without licenses to sell in their locality. A 3-year Federal license to deal in firearms may be obtained from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms [BATF] for $30. A valid State of local dealers license is not required. In New York City, for example, fewer than 1 in 12 people who have Federal dealer licenses holds a valid local license. In the District of Columbia, where handgun sales are banned, 35 have Federal dealers licenses. In fact, federally licensed dealerships have increased 64 percent from 174,000 in 1980 to over 285,000 today.

Law enforcement officials at every level worry that easy access to Federal dealer licenses may contravene efforts to control the flow of guns to criminals. The Gun Control Act of 1968 prohibits anyone but a federally licensed dealer from shipping guns interstate directly from the manufacturer or distributor. But the loophole permits gun running. People with licenses, says BATF, "can purchase any handgun, rifle, or shotgun anywhere and anytime." Thousands of guns are bought by federally licensed dealers and sold illegally to drug gangs, organized crime, and common street criminals.

Law enforcement agencies have attempted to stem this flow. BATF has brought criminal charges against approximately 289 dealers in the past 2 years, and New York City police have caused 18 to be surrendered. But there are 285,035 licenses nationwide, and almost 40,000 apply for new licenses each year. Only 37 of 34,000 new permit requests were denied during the same year.

This bill does not mandate new gun control legislation for the States. It simply requires that Federal licensing of dealers conforms to standards established at the State and local levels. It is simple common sense.

"It's a loophole you can drive a truck through," one Federal law enforcement official told the Washington Post. I hope my colleagues agree it is time to close this loophole. I urge them to co-sponsor this legislation.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill, a letter of support sent to me by former New York City Police Commissioner Lee Brown, and articles from the New York Times and Washington Post be printed in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(3) by adding at the end the following:

"(F) in the case of an application for a license to engage in the business of dealing firearms—

U.S. Senator, Russell Senate Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MOYNIHAN: I am writing to urge you to introduce to the Senate a bill requiring all Federal Firearm license applicants to submit proof that they are duly licensed under state and local law.

I urge you to take this action as President of the International Association of Chiefs of Police (IACP) and as Police Commissioner of the New York City Police Department.

As you know, under current federal regulations, applicants for Federal Firearm Licenses (FFL) are already required to be licensed with the state and local government of their residence. This legislation merely closes a loophole allowing FFL holders to order weapons for delivery to their houses or businesses without compliance with local licensing requirements.

In my capacity as President of IACP, one of the largest police agencies in the nation, I remind you of the paramount concern law enforcement has with stopping the entry of illegal guns into our local jurisdictions. The legislation introduced in the House by Congressman Bill Green, requiring proof of compliance with state and local law, is consistent with the stated policies of IACP. I am urging you to introduce a similar bill in the Senate.

In summary, I believe that with illegal firearms currently causing an alarming rate of death and serious injuries, the closing of this legislative loophole is both wise and timely. I urge you to give your attention to the introduction of this legislation.

Sincerely,

LEE P. BROWN,
President.

LICENSE TO KILL

In an eye-opening series this week titled "Under the Gun," staff writer Pierre Thomas reported that getting a federal license to sell firearms is a snap. Fill out a short form, pay $30, and in about 45 days you've got a license.

No fuss and probably no bother—most records aren't audited for decades. No wonder business is jumping—with more than 270 licenses a day issued in 1991. Of 34,000 applications for new licenses last year, only 37 were denied. There were 57,327 licenses renewed and only 15 renewal applications denied. The total number of license-holders, most of them considered law-abiding, is ridiculously high—276,000, up 59 percent since 1980, while the number of federal inspectors assigned primarily to gun dealers is down 13 percent. And oh, yes: Guns have killed 60,000 people in this country in five years.

So what's the matter with the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, the agency that dishes out all these licenses and then can't begin to monitor them? This agency is only as effective as the law allows it to be, and in this case the law is just the way—weak—the NRA likes. The gun lobby prefers an agency with minimum computerized capacity to check records or use a central database. In 1986, when members of Congress were even more cowed by the gun lobby than they are today, the NRA and its semiautomatic water-carrier in the Senate at the time—Republican James A. McClure of Idaho, now retired—succeeded in weakening what law was on the books. His legislation reduced certain recordkeeping violations by dealers from felonies to misdemeanors and forbade ATF to inspect any gun dealer more than once a year.

ATF needs its teeth back. The agency is good at what it is allowed to do, including the tracking of guns, even though it may have to sift through slips of paper because it hasn't been able to computerize its records quickly enough. Good legislation has been proposed before and should be enacted now. It's obvious that tougher federal controls are needed, along with a force that can inspect all license-holders regularly. One other proposal that could take effect quickly would require any applicant for a federal license to supply certification of compliance with all state and local ordinances. This, with an accelerated automation and inspection plan, could begin to make a difference right away. So could some tighter rules on applications for renewals.

The gun manufacturers for whom the NRA fronts will insist that the killers will always get firearms without paying attention to tougher controls. Why not test their argument? As it stands, the federal system is a disgrace.

REVOKING LICENSES TO KILL

(By James B. Jacobs)

The Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and New York City, both license firearms dealers, but the city's licensing criteria are much more stringent, requiring fingerprints and a criminal-records check. Consequently, according to the New York City police, there are 1,043 federally licensed firearms dealers in New York City but only 77 city-licensed dealers.

Anyone with a Federal license can purchase unlimited firearms by mail order from manufacturers. The B.A.T.F. is required to grant an applicant's request for a license unless it has evidence that the applicant fails to meet Federal standards. Since the bureau does not require fingerprints or proof of eligibility, it essentially operates as an honor system. Moreover, while Federal regulations require prospective firearms dealers to follow all state and local laws and regulations, they do not require proof of having obtained a local license.

Not surprisingly, some federally licensed firearms dealers in New York City have criminal records and, even worse, are in business to supply weapons to criminals. A 1985 U.S. Department of Justice study found that 21 percent of armed criminals obtained their handguns directly through licensed gun dealers.

A small but eminently sensible step to take would be for Congress or the B.A.T.F. to require that applicants for Federal licenses provide proof to having met local laws for dealing in firearms. A New York City applicant would have to show that he had conformed to the city's demanding standards. If he could not make such a showing, he would be unable to obtain a Federal license—and unable to purchase firearms directly from legitimate manufacturers and wholesalers.

HIT-OR-MISS CONTROL OF FIREARMS SALES; ENFORCERS CAN'T KEEP UP WITH DEALERS

(By Pierre Thomas)

Getting a federal license to sell rifles, shotguns and handguns can be as easy as sending in a two-page form and paying a $30 fee. Look for the license in your mailbox 45 days or so later.

Chances are nearly nine out of 10 that no one will interview you beforehand. Once you're licensed, federal inspectors won't get around to auditing your records and business practices for about 20 years. Renewals of the three-year license are virtually automatic.

Even if you live in the District, where local law has banned handgun sales since 1976 and the homicide rate has soared, you can obtain a federal permit to sell firearms.

The District's ban on handgun sales is only as strong as dealers' willingness to limit their business to rifles and shotguns. There are 46 federally licensed gun dealers in the District, and in the last two years, inspectors have checked two. D.C. police leave responsibility for monitoring dealers to the federal government.

"It's a joke," said Melvin Abrams, a longtime Baltimore County gun dealer. "The politicians are screaming about gun control, but [the federal government] is handing out licenses to every Tom, Dick and Harry. And then they never check the people. It make you want to scream."

More than 60,000 people nationwide have been killed with guns in the last five years. The federal licensing system, meanwhile, if not a joke, is at least a well of irony, its critics and top officials agree.

At the heart of that irony is the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms. It is the federal agency most responsible for enforcing federal gun-control laws and curbing illegal gun trafficking, but its mission as a licensing agency is to get permits into—not keep them out of—the hands of dealers. Congress and powerful lobbyists pressure the bureau constantly to make gun-selling in the United States as hassle-free as possible.

"Anybody can get a license to sell firearms," said Tony Haynes, head of ATF's licensing center. More than 270 licenses a day—91,000 new and renewed permits in all—were issued in 1991 by the licensing center, which is in Atlanta. Of 34,000 applications for new licenses that year, 37 were denied. The agency renewed 57,327 licenses, while denying 15 renewal requests.

Haynes said his mandate is to "issue licenses and to do it as quickly and efficiently as possible." Federal regulations require ATF to process applications within 45 days.

There are more than 276,000 federally licensed gun dealers in the United States. ATF officials say that most are law-abiding, but that the agency has issued more permits than it can hope to monitor closely.

ATF bureau has 13 percent fewer field inspectors assigned primarily to gun dealers today than it had a decade ago. The number of federally licensed dealers, however, has grown rapidly. In 1980, there were 174,000; now there are 102,000 more—an increase of 59 percent.

Stephen Higgins, director of the agency, said that at present inspection rates and with current staff levels, it will be 20 years before ATF inspectors audit some licensees. "With 280,000 licensed dealers," Higgins said, "we're not going to get around to some of these people in their lifetime."

"No, I'm not comfortable with that, but the unfortunate fact is that we are not going to get more" money for inspections, Higgins said. "It's much easier to get Congress to approve task forces . . . of agents who are going to be working street gangs or violent criminals."

Such special operations have become more common in recent years, and arrests by ATF's 1,947 agents have grown. A surprising number of dealers have been accused of breaking the law and contributing to urban violence.

At least 600 federally licensed dealers across the country have been arrested on criminal charges in the last five years, most for illegal weapons sales.

More than a dozen federally licensed dealers in Detroit have been charged with providing more than 2,000 firearms to criminals in the city.

A Richmond gun dealer recently pleaded guilty to falsifying federal firearms reports and then committed suicide after 100 guns he sold were confiscated in New York.

"There are just so many [new dealers] coming in," said Ed McKita, who supervises nine ATF inspectors responsible for monitoring 7,500 licensed Virginia dealers from a field office in Richmond. "There is just so much that you can do."

ATF'S HISTORY

Formed in 1972 as a branch of the Treasury Department, the bureau traces its history to 1863, when Congress established an office to collect taxes on alcohol.

In the 1920s, the Bureau of Prohibition was set up to track down bootleggers and gangsters. ATF agents today proudly declare themselves successors of that bureau's most famous agent, Eliot Ness, who snared mobster Al Capone and whose exploits were memorialized in a television series, "The Untouchables," and a movie of the same name.

ATF, nevertheless, has worked in the shadow of the more prestigious and better-funded Federal Bureau of Investigation, part of the Justice Department. ATF, with 4,203 employees, has a $341 million annual operating budget, less than a quarter of the FBI's.

ATF's deities include apprehending gun-runners, investigating explosions and arsons, auditing cigarette plants and tracking down the relatively few remaining moonshiners. The agency says it collects $10 billion in taxes from the industries it regulates.

The mandate for ATF's regulation of firearms is the Gun Control Act of 1968, the nation's primary gun-control law, passed after the shooting deaths of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. and Sen. Robert F. Kennedy.

The law provided for more comprehensive licensing of and record keeping by dealers so that weapons used in violent crimes could be traced to their original purchasers. The law also banned felons, people deemed mentally incompetent and some other from receiving, possessing or selling firearms.

ATF is charged with licensing dealers and with making sure that their sales are properly recorded and that they do not knowingly sell to prohibited buyers. It also runs the federal gun-tracing center in Landover, which helps law enforcement agencies track weapons used in violent crimes.

ATF's efforts to regulate guns have been hamstrung for years by the powerful gun lobby, led by the National Rifle Association. When, for instance, ATF tries to track a gun used in a crime, it often does so by flipping through slips of paper recording gun sales. Congress, responding to NRA assertions, has denied the agency money to computerize certain records of gun sales.

The gun lobby is opposed to any central database of gun owners, fearing it eventually could lead to confiscation of weapons from law-abiding citizens.

Proponents of stricter national gun control generally support strengthening ATF's oversight of dealers. Opponents often attack the competence of the agency and the attitudes of its agents, often described by critics as overzealous.

The agency has "made an awful lot of errors in their enforcement efforts," said James A. McClure, an Idaho Republican and frequent ATF critic who retired from the Senate in 1990. "Some pretty awful things were done—unlawful search and seizures, entrapment" of gun dealers. At times, McClure said, the agency "trampled on the Constitution."

Rep. William J. Hughes (D-N.J.), a supporter of stricter gun control, said complaints such as McClure's are "grossly over-exaggerated" and part of overall efforts to "decimate the agency."

"There has been a concerted effort in recent administrations and in Congress," Hughes said, "to beat them down."

Hughes pointed to legislation cosponsored by McClure and passed in 1986 that reduced certain record-keeping violations by dealers from felonies to misdemeanors and forbade ATF to inspect any gun dealer more than once a year.

"We wanted them to get back to the field [to make criminal cases] rather than harassing dealers," McClure said. "We as Americans don't like the idea of Big Brother." Hughes countered that those changes produced a system with "no safeguards."

While required to issue permits quickly, ATF also is expected to ensure that undesirable do not get them. That process can be fraught with pitfalls.

Four ATF computer operators run names and Social Security numbers through a Treasury Department database to determine whether applicants are under federal investigation. They also check the FBI-run National Crime Information Center, a databank of crime records from federal, state and local agencies.

While some consider the FBI databanks more than adequate, others contend there are critical flaws in it. The system usually cannot determine, for example, when the name and Social Security number on an application are false.

Several years ago, in an effort to underscore that weakness, a reporter submitted a made-up Social Security number as part of the application for a gun dealer's license for a pet dog, Haynes said. The computer found no criminal record under the dog's name, Fifi, or Social Security number, and a license was issued.

"If a criminal lies, I can't catch that up front," Haynes said. "Fifi the dog was clean."

David Nemecek, the head of the National Crime Information Center, said in a recent interview that though there are more than 16 million records in the system, not all local agencies contribute information. The database, moreover, is more complete for people born in 1956 and after. Many born earlier "may or may not be in the system," Nemecek said.

FEW SAFEGUARDS UP FRONT

ATF says it does not have the money to do fingerprint checks on applicants. Moreover, Haynes said, because of limited resources, there are very few pre-approval visits, in which an ATF inspector meets the dealer-to-be, gets answers to any nagging questions and explains rules and regulations.

Guns are "probably the most deadly consumer product, and it's essentially an unregulated industry," said Dennis Henigan, director of the D.C.-based Center to Prevent Handgun Violence.

Richard Gardiner, counsel for the NRA's Institute for Legislative Action, said the vast majority of gun dealers use their licenses to purchase guns for their personal use. Strengthening ATF oversight, he said, "would only make life difficult for more law-abiding people."

Abrams's Valley Gun Store in Parkville, a Baltimore suburb, is an example of how the federal system of gun regulation is supposed to work.

The inventory of Valley Gun, which stocks virtually every gun available, is guarded by clerks carrying guns in holsters and by a closed-circuit television system.

During his 43 years in business, Abrams said, he has sold more than 200,000 guns. ATF inspects his operation once a year, partly because he is a large dealer and sells machine guns and partly because weapons purchased at some time from his store often turn up in criminal investigations.

At Abrams's store, gun purchasers fill out two government forms—one from ATF, the other from the state of Maryland. Abrams, as the dealer, is required to keep the yellow ATF form for possible inspection by the agency—especially if the weapon is used in a crime.

ATF requires no background checks before the sales are made. Maryland law, however, imposes a seven-day waiting period for handguns and requires Abrams to send the white state form to the Maryland State Police for review and a background check.

But many dealers have trouble complying with the red tape that accompanies legal gun sales. More than half of the gun dealers inspected by ATF last year were cited for violations such as incomplete records of gun buyers and reductions in gun inventories unaccounted for in sales records.

REACTING TO PROBLEMS

Pat McGlone, who has been an inspector for 22 years, said she worries that too often the agency is reacting to problems once they develop rather than working to prevent them through adequate policing of dealers.

A single bad dealer has the power to quickly put a large number of guns into the wrong hands. "Hopefully, we can catch them [bad dealers] before too much damage is done," McGlone said. "But in the meantime, how many people will have been injured or worse?"

ATF's lack of monitoring leads to poor coordination between federal and state law enforcement agencies.

In Maryland, for example, ATF has licensed about 3,000 gun dealers. Only 300, however, have registered with the state police.

No one knows whether the 2,700 others are selling guns and complying with state and local firearms, tax, business and land-use laws.

The Virginia State Police, which does background checks on gun buyers in that state, recently formed a firearms section to find out more about nearly 2,000 federally licensed dealers who have not registered with the state.

Some see a distinct irony in current efforts to impose a nationwide waiting period for handgun buyers. "We don't go anywhere near that far in relation to gun dealers," said Roland Vaughn, recently retired president of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, which favors the national waiting period. "That's a significant flaw, and it ought to be corrected immediately." ●

S. 114. A bill to authorize reduced postage rates for certain mail matter sent to Members of Congress; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

AUTHORIZING CERTAIN REDUCED POSTAGE RATES

● Mr. INOUE. Mr. President, I rise to introduce a bill to provide for the issuance of a special 1-cent postage stamp to be used for correspondence with Members of Congress.

Mr. President, ours is a democratic Government—a representative Government—and thus, by definition, one dependent on the continuing operation of a two-way communication system between the people of this country and their elected representatives.

Each Member of Congress is directly responsible to those people in the State or district that he or she represents. He or she must not only keep communication channels open but, more importantly, must be responsive to the concerns he receives through these channels. The most practical means of transmitting these constituent concerns is through the mail. It is most difficult for many of us to imagine ourselves in a situation where the desire to express an opinion is frustrated because we must think twice about spending money on a postage stamp. Unfortunately, we must face the fact that many of our Nation's citizens are forced to consider the purchase of a 29-cent postage stamp for the purpose of expressing a grievance, or opinion or idea, as something beyond their means.

The issuance of a 1-cent stamp for this purpose would effectively remove this prohibition and allow all citizens to apprise their Representatives and Senators of their individual thoughts and position on issues facing our Nation. This measure would amend the Postal Reform Act of 1970 to provide for the issuance of these 1-cent stamps to be sold at U.S. post offices. The bill also authorizes appropriations necessary to account for the difference in postal revenue resulting from the sale of 1 cent stamps as opposed to prevailing postage rates for mail matter addressed to Congressmen which does not exceed 4 ounces in weight.

Recognizing the necessity of open communication between elected officials and people, Congress adopted the franking system allowing congressional communication by elected officials with constituents. We have neglected, however, to provide our constituents with a convenient and affordable means of access to their Senators and Congressmen. It is difficult to overstate the importance of this concept of individual expression. Each and every citizen has the right and the responsibility to participate in the democratic system, through both the ballot box and through correspondence with their Representatives between elections.

Because the effective operation of our political system is dependent upon open communications, I am hopeful this bill will receive the early approval of the Congress.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) chapter 32 of title 39, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 3221. Mail matter sent to Members of Congress

"(a) Any person may send any piece of mail matter, not exceeding four ounces in weight, for postage of 1 cent to (1) any Member of the Senate representing the State, and (2) the Member of the House of Representatives representing the district, in which such person resides, if that person uses a special stamp issued by the Postal Service for any such matter. The Postal Service shall issue special 1-cent stamps to be used in sending such matter, and such stamps shall be only sold at post offices.

"(b) For the purposes of this section—

"(1) 'district' includes Puerto Rico and the District of Columbia;

"(2) 'Member of the House of Representatives' includes a Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner; and

"(3) a Member of the House of Representatives elected at large from a State having more than one district shall be considered a Member elected from each district of that State."

(b) The analysis of such chapter is amended by adding after the item relating to section 3220 the following new item:

"3221. Mail matter sent to Members of Congress."

(c) Section 2401(c) of such title is amended by inserting "3221," after "3217.".

S. 118. A bill to require the Commodity Credit Corporation to refund to first processors of sugarcane and sugar beets marketing assessments collected by the Corporation during fiscal year 1991, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

REFUND OF CERTAIN ASSESSMENTS

• Mr. INOUE. Mr. President, I rise to introduce a measure to correct an inequity created by the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1990 which established marketing assessments on sugar.

Assessments were initially collected by the U.S. Department of Agriculture [USDA] on sugar produced during the 1991 through 1995 crop years. While the technical corrections amendments to the Food, Agriculture, Conservation and Trade Act of 1990 changed the basis of the assessment from the production to the marketing of sugar, it was silent on refunds for assessments made on production from July 1, 1991 to September 30, 1991. During this period, the Hawaii sugarcane producers, and some sugarbeet processors in California were the only producers that paid an assessment. Without a refund, Hawaii's producers will pay an assessment on 3 more months of production than other domestic producers in the amount of approximately $900,000.

Most unfortunately, the Hawaii sugarcane producers are experiencing serious financial difficulties with the planned shutdown of two large operations. It clearly cannot afford to let this additional 3-month assessment matter to lie in limbo.

Former U.S. Department of Agriculture Secretary Madigan, upon consultation with his legal counsel, stated that this, inequity can only be corrected by legislation. Accordingly, the USDA's legal staff drafted the attached measure which has his support.

My measure is a simple and technical one which restores not only equity, but also returns to Hawaii's sugarcane producers funds that they cannot do without during this critical period. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation. •

S. 119. A bill to restore the traditional observance of Memorial Day and Veterans Day; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TRADITIONAL OBSERVANCE OF CERTAIN HOLIDAYS

• Mr. INOUE. Mr. President, in our effort to accommodate many Americans by making the last Monday in May, Memorial Day, we have lost sight of the significance of this day to our Nation. My bill would restore Memorial Day to May 30 and authorize our flag to fly at half-mast on that day. In addition, this legislation would authorize the President to issue a proclamation making both Memorial Day and Veterans Day days for prayer and ceremonies. This legislation would help restore the recognition our veterans deserve for the sacrifices they have made on behalf of our Nation.

S. 120. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to deem certain service in the organized military forces of the Government of the Commonwealth of the Philippines and the Philippine Scouts to have been active service for purposes of benefits under programs administered by the Secretary of Veterans Affairs; to the Committee on Veterans Affairs.

FILIPINO VETERANS EQUITY ACT

• Mr. INOUE. Mr. President, today, I rise to introduce legislation which amends title 38, United States Code, to restore full veterans' benefits, by reason of service, to certain organized military forces of the Philippine Commonwealth Army and the Philippine Scouts.

On July 26, 1941, President Roosevelt issued a military order that called members of the Philippine Commonwealth Army into the service of the United States Forces of the Far East. Under the command of Gen. Douglas MacArthur, our Filipino allies joined alongside American soldiers in fighting some of the most fierce battles of World War II.

From the onset of the war through February 18, 1946, Filipinos who were called into service under President Roosevelt's order were entitled to full veterans' benefits by reason of their active service in our Armed Forces. Unfortunately, on February 18, 1946, Congress enacted the Rescission Act of 1946, now codified as section 107, title 38, United States Code, which states that service performed by these Filipino veterans is not deemed as active service for purposes of any law of the United States conferring rights, privileges, or benefits. On May 27, 1946, Congress extended the limitation on benefits to the New Filipino Scout units.

Interestingly enough, section 107 is the only instance in this century where Congress drew distinction between veterans with regard to entitlements on the basis of how, where, or why they served in our Armed Forces. For example, this discriminatory treatment was reserved for Filipino veterans. Over 100,000 aliens who joined our Armed Forces during World War II are entitled full veterans benefits.

Section 107 denied Filipino veterans access to health care, particularly for nonservice-connected disability, and denied them other benefits such as pensions and home loan guaranties. Additionally, section 107 limited the benefits received from service-connected disabilities and death compensation of 50 percent of what was received by their American counterparts.

As a result of the 1946 act, Filipino veterans sued to obtain relief from this discriminatory treatment. The U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, on May 12, 1989, in Quiban versus U.S. Veterans Administration and Quizon versus U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia declared section 107 of title 38, United States Code to be unconstitutional. However, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia reversed that ruling and the veterans did not file a petition for certiorari to the Supreme Court, making Congress the responsible body to rectify this injustice.

For many years, Filipino veterans of World War II have sought to correct this injustice by seeking equal treatment for their valiant military service in our Armed Forces. We must not ignore the recognition they duly deserve as U.S. veterans. Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to support this measure which would restore full veterans' benefits, by reason of service, to our Filipino allies of World War II.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my bill be placed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

• Mr. INOUE. Mr. President, today, I introduce a bill, along with Senator SIMON, which amends the Immigration and Nationality Act to allow the prompt parole of aliens into the United States for the purpose of attending the funeral of an immediate blood relative.

The proposed measure is similar to H.R. 97, but includes a provision that addresses potential abuse. Under the provisions of this bill, an alien is required to provide a certified copy of the death certificate of the relative. The parole period shall not exceed 30 days except under circumstances specified by the Attorney General. In addition, the bill denies parole status to aliens who are excludable from admission into the United States. Further, the Attorney General is required to report to Congress any violations or abuses of the immigration law resulting from the parole of aliens into the United States.

While current statutes provide for the administrative parole of aliens into the United States to attend funerals of immediate family members, often times, aliens from certain countries are without justification delayed or denied timely entry by embassy officials. To remedy this injustice, this bill mandates expeditious entry into the United States to any alien who can prove the death of an immediate blood relative with a death certificate. Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to support this bill.

By Mr. INOUE:

S. 124. A bill to establish a temporary program under which parenteral diacetylmorphine will be made available through qualified pharmacies for the relief of intractable pain due to cancer, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

COMPASSIONATE PAIN RELIEF ACT

• Mr. INOUE. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which is directed to relieving the suffering of a small but significant number of our citizens; patients who are terminally ill with cancer and whose pain has not been effectively mitigated with currently available medications.

For many years, the thought of cancer and its accompanying pain have sent chills of fear through all of us; likewise, the thought of heroin and its addictive qualities produces similar fears. In my judgment, we are in a position now where we can make a logical and thoughtful decision to legalize the therapeutic use of heroin for the terminally ill cancer patient suffering intractable pain while at the same time safeguarding against the diversion of the drug into illicit channels.

The legislation I am introducing today is supported by thousands of Americans. Furthermore, it reflects the evolution and attitude of our Nation's health care system as evidenced by an editorial in the January 14, 1982, issue of the prestigious New England Journal of Medicine, which urged more flexibility in the use of addictive drugs in the treatment of pain. This attitude is also present in an official statement made by the American Psychiatric Association which endorses the "principle that the effectiveness of relief of pain in terminal cancer patients should take priority over a concern about additions of the terminal cancer patient and should take priority over a concern about medication diversion to addicts." A later article in the New England Journal of Medicine of August 23, 1984, by Dr. Allen Mondzac, reviewed the unique characteristics of heroin and its valuable clinical role where it is available.

The need for this legislation is dramatic. Although over the past two decades a great deal of progress has been made in treating cancer, each year an estimated 800,000 Americans are diagnosed as having cancer, and over 400,000 die from the disease. Most of these individuals will have received competent and compassionate medical care, and many will receive adequate relief of pain. Unfortunately, the reality is also that a certain number of cancer patients do not obtain relief of pain from the current available analgesic medication—even the strongest narcotics. An NIH panel that convened in May 1986, heard testimony that 50 to 60 percent of patients with cancer pain lived the last part of their lives with unrelieved severe pain. A recent 1992 survey by the Eastern Cooperative Oncology Group has found that as a general rule, patients underreport pain and physicians undertreat it. As a minimal figure, it has elsewhere been estimated that about 20 percent of terminal cancer patients suffer significant pain. Of this 20 percent, it has been estimated that 10 percent do not obtain relief with presently prescribed medications. In human terms, these percentages mean that as many as 8,000 Americans may die in agony this year because of the intractable pain associated with terminal cancer. I have been assured by my medical colleagues that in many cases this pain can be alleviated with the therapeutic use of heroin, making the last weeks, months, or days of these patients more bearable. These dying patients are not now given the option of dying with dignity because of our Nation's continued and overriding fear of heroin. In my judgment, this fear alone has continued to prevent us, the lawmakers of our Nation, from making clear and rational decisions regarding the limited use of this long-proven and already available substance.

Heroin has been proven effective with a number of patients in relieving pain. Research completed at Georgetown University's Vincent T. Lombardi Cancer Research Center has found heroin to be an effective analgesic for the control of cancer-related pain. In particular, it has been reported to be more potent than morphine in relieving cancer pain. Less than half of the dose of heroin produces the same pain relief as a dose of morphine. In the terminal phase of cancer many patients cannot take medication by mouth, and may require injections. As the disease progresses, individuals may require higher doses at more frequent intervals, to provide relief. This is when it would be desirable to have the option of using heroin in treating pain, since heroin is more potent and more soluble than morphine salts, and an effective dose can be administered in considerably smaller volumes. Thus, doctors have informed me that it is less painful to have such an injection—an important consideration in the emaciated patient with little tissue mass remaining. In addition, its euphoric effects might be beneficial for people who know they are dying.

Further, the onset of action of the heroin is also more rapid than morphine because of its solubility, giving relief of pain and a sense of well-being sooner. It is most unfortunate that the use of heroin for these patients has not been allowed up to this date. This legislation will enable physicians to treat the dying cancer patient who suffers from intractable pain with a proven, effective medication.

The time has now come to address the issue of why the heroin should not be readily available as a therapeutic medication for our Nation's physicians in very specific situations when we have dying cancer patients who are suffering extreme pain. William F. Buckley, Jr., Editor-at-Large of National Review, has described our irrational maintenance of the prohibition against such uses of heroin in very real terms. As he pointed out:

The irony is that anybody in a major city can acquire the knowledge necessary to buy heroin from a dirty little drug pimp, but licensed doctors may not administer the identical drug to men and women—and children—literally dying from excruciating pain.

Our colleagues on the House Subcommittee on Health and the Environment held hearings on a similar bill on September 4, 1980. At the time, a number of practicing physicians and others asked that the Federal controls on heroin be eased to permit the prescription of heroin for patients for whom more conventional pain killers were inadequate. It was further pointed out that in Great Britain, heroin has been used for years for these patients and that it has been shown to be particularly effective for those 10 percent of terminal cancer patients who require injected medication. British physicians consider heroin to be an indispensable potent narcotic analgesic in the treatment of advanced cancer. Use of heroin in specific situations is also permitted in Belgium, New Zealand, China, and many other civilized nations.

Since this information was made public in the House hearings the editorial writers of our country have taken up the issue, as reflected in supportive statements by, among a number of others, the New York Times, the Washington Post, the Washington Times, the Los Angeles Times, the San Francisco Chronicle, the San Francisco Examiner, the Honolulu Star-Bulletin, the Honolulu Advertiser, the Chicago Sun-Times, the Cleveland Plain Dealer, the Rocky Mount News, and the Richmond Times-Dispatch. Both National Review and the New Republic have backed the proposal. The American Nurses' Association has come out strongly endorsing this merciful action. As a result of widespread support among physicians and the general public, heroin has become available in Canada for terminal cancer patients.

The bill I am introducing today will give a very high priority to relief from intractable pain for terminal cancer patients. It authorizes the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services to establish demonstration programs which will permit the use of heroin by terminally ill cancer patients only, when suffering from pain which is not effectively treated with currently available analgesic medications.

My bill has more than adequate safeguards to prevent the drug from being introduced to the general public. For example, a diagnosis must be made by the attending physician that his or her patient is ill with cancer and is suffering from pain which is not being effectively treated with other available analgesic medications. This diagnosis must be reviewed and approved by a medical review board of the hospital which will dispense the heroin. The heroin used in the program will be from that supply now confiscated under current laws. The Secretary of Health and Human Services is further authorized to establish additional regulations for the safe use and storage of heroin, to prevent its diversion into illicit channels. This program will be in force for a 5-year period and periodic reporting is required of the Secretary on the activities under the bill.

I strongly believe that the proposal will provide substantial benefits to those who are in intractable pain from terminal cancer and I am hopeful that my colleagues on the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee will give this measure their prompt and most serious consideration.

Mr. President, I request unanimous consent that the text of this bill and an article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 124

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Compassionate Pain Relief Act".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

Congress finds that—

(1) cancer is a progressive, degenerative, and often painful disease that afflicts one out of every four persons in the United States and is the second leading cause of death;

(2) in the progression of terminal cancer, a significant number of patients experience levels of intense and intractable pain that cannot be effectively treated by presently available medication;

(3) the effect of such pain often leads to a severe deterioration in the quality of life of the patient and heartbreak for the family of the patient;

(4) the therapeutic use of parenteral diacetylmorphine is not permitted in the United States but extensive clinical research has demonstrated that the drug is a potent, highly soluble painkilling drug when properly formulated and administered under the supervision of a physician;

(5) it is in the public interest to make parenteral diacetylmorphine available to patients through controlled channels as a drug for the relief of intractable pain due to terminal cancer;

(6) diacetylmorphine is successfully used in Great Britain and other countries for relief of pain due to cancer;

(7) the availability of parenteral diacetylmorphine for the limited purposes of controlling intractable pain due to terminal cancer will not adversely affect the abuse of illicit drugs or increase the incidence of pharmacy thefts;

(8) the availability of parenteral diacetylmorphine will enhance the ability of physicians to effectively treat and control intractable pain due to terminal cancer; and

(9) it is appropriate for the Federal Government to establish a temporary program to permit the use of pharmaceutical dosage forms of parenteral diacetylmorphine for the control of intractable pain due to terminal cancer.

SEC. 3. PARENTERAL DIACETYLMORPHINE PROGRAM.

Title III of the Public Health Service Act (42 U.S.C. 241 et seq.) is amended by adding at the end the following new part:

PUBLIC PERCEPTIONS AND THE THERAPEUTIC USE OF HEROIN

(By Robert L. McCarthy and Michael Montagne)

Heroin, diacetylmorphine, has been recognized, for most of the 20th century, as a drug of abuse. There is significant evidence to support such a characterization. Unfortunately, the stigma associated with heroin has prevented it from being viewed as a drug with any legitimate medical use. Unlike its pharmacological analogs, morphine and hydromorphone, heroin's abuse potential has overshadowed, even eliminated, its consideration as a clinical agent.

This unidimensional view of diacetylmorphine is one which has developed slowly over time. It began in the early 1900s when grave concerns about the potential adverse effects of heroin resulted in its virtual exile from the arsenal of agents used in pain management. It was further developed during the drug culture of the 1960s and 1970s when heroin became a symbol for a generation of Americans using illicit substances. The resultant "opiophobia," referred to by Morgan and Pleet, led to not only the under-prescribing of "accepted" narcotic analgesics, but also to the further alienation of diacetylmorphine from legitimate medicine.¹ It has become difficult, if not impossible, for the public to equate heroin with legitimate drug therapy.

Given this backdrop, the authors undertook a project to examine heroin from a public policy and ethical stance. What impact has the public perception of heroin had on its ability to be viewed as a legitimate medication, worthy of classification as such? Has this public perception also influenced governmental officials, the creators of policy, who may not wish to be considered advocates of heroin? In what ways, if any, have professional organizations within health care acted unethically, or at least unprofessionally, in their policies opposing heroin's legalization? What are the rights of patients, both legally and ethically, to have available medications which are of potential therapeutic use? This paper examines how the public's perception, with regard to heroin, has been influenced by the media. Future papers will address these additional questions.

The views of many Americans are shaped, at least in part, by what they are exposed to via the media. Both electronic and print media play an important role in shaping conclusions that are drawn by the public about a wide range of issues. This study focuses on how the print media has addressed the heroin issue and its potential influence on public perceptions. What has the media portrayed about heroin and heroin use, and have these images influenced society's perceptions? How reflective of individual and societal beliefs and public policy are these media reports?

BACKGROUND

American society did not arrive at their attitudes towards heroin overnight. Concerns about the availability and usage of opiates extends back to at least the Civil War era of 1860-65. So-called "Soldier's Disease," opiate addiction which allegedly afflicted Civil War veterans as a result of freely used analgesics during the war, is an early such reference. Ironically, as Mandel points out, Soldier's Disease is a myth, concocted in the 20th century. No evidence exists that such widespread addiction, as a result of the use of opiates, ever occurred.² It appears that misinformation about these drugs is not solely a creation of modern times. Mandel goes on to argue that opiate abuses was not the extensive social problem it was suggested to be in the early 1900s, prior to the passage of the Harrison Narcotic Act. Further, that devoid of such a social problem, legal restriction of these agents was an unnecessary exercise. Interestingly, in sharp contrast to our present day context, the mass media virtually ignored the opiate issue.³

As we are all well aware, the role played by the media in the lives of Americans is much more significant than it was 80 or 90 years ago. The development and expansion of electronic media alone has made more information available to a wider audience. More importantly, the influence of the mass media in shaping public opinion is greater than ever before in the past. As Winick argues, the expectations and hopes of patients, the responsiveness of government and the marketing strategies of pharmaceutical manufacturers all may be affected by the content of the media.⁴ It would be naive to suggest that our views of issues and events are not at least partially the result of the method of presentation and slant to a story provided by the media.

This impact of the mass media on the formation of public opinion may take several forms; overt endorsement, subtle support or documented opposition of an issue may all be tactics used, whether or not done so consciously. One would hope that when the media does adopt such strategies to influence public opinion, they would do so only after careful analysis of the factors involved. Unfortunately, most members of the media are not scientists, and therefore cannot be expected to utilize the scientific method in such analyses. This becomes especially frustrating to those of us trained as biomedical scientists and accustomed to careful evaluation prior to arriving at a conclusion. Cohen, writing about the media's portrayal of benzodiazepines reflects this frustration. He writes, "Trial by media can never take the place of careful scientific evaluation of a psychotropic drug. The two methods are antithetical. Scientific inquiry depends on careful examination of data. The media cannot present information in detail. It titillates, dramatizes and pulls facts out of context. It is unfortunate, but it is so."⁵

This approach to news reporting also places the media at risk for manipulation. Special interest groups with a particular social agenda, and the ability to frame their viewpoint clearly and concisely, can utilize the media to influence public opinion. DiChiara writes about just such a tactic relative to drug law reform. He argues that the media can be used to present a substance abuser as either an anomaly and a danger to society, or as the victim of an illness in need of treatment.⁶

Among the many areas in which the media plays a role in shaping societal beliefs is that of drugs and their reputations. The public's perception of penicillin, for example, is quite divergent from that of an opiate like heroin. Why? For one thing, the vast majority of individuals in the United States have taken penicillin at one time or another. The same cannot be said for heroin. With penicillin, its familiarity to the public allows people to relay less on the information provided by others—the government and media, for example—to inform them about the drug. As Maloff asserts, "The power of formal controls (with media support) to influence drug reputations is particularly salient in the case of drugs like heroin, known rarely by firsthand (or even secondhand) experience. In the absence of widespread use or transmission of users' unique knowledge to nonusers, cultural images are easily manipulated by society's so-called experts."⁷

In this paper, heroin is used as a case study of the broader relationship between the mass media and the public. We contend that heroin's negative reputation has, in large part, been created by the media. However to argue that this influence is solely unidirectional assumes that the media can insulate itself from popular opinion. We would assert that the media is both influential and reflective relative to the public at large. As Maloff writes, "Media coverage may also be taken as an indicator of public sentiment, reflecting as well as shaping heroin's reputation."⁸

METHODOLOGY

A total of 405 articles, which mentioned heroin or diacetylmorphine in either the title and/or text, published in the New York Times, Washington Post, Christian Science Monitor, USA Today, Time and Newsweek were found and reviewed. Due to factors including chronological limit of the database, number of articles in each periodical and age of the periodical, the inclusive dates of collection vary. These dates, by periodical, are listed in Table I. The periodicals were chosen for reasons of demographic diversity among readership, national distribution and database availability.

All articles were content analyzed. Article titles, prominence and themes were reviewed in an attempt to determine the way in which heroin, vis-a-vis the popular press, has been portrayed to the American public.

TABLE I

Article title themes and content themes were assigned to categories that were both created prior to analysis as well as created during article analysis. This method combines both well accepted approaches in content analysis to the creation of categories. During article review, content themes which fell into multiple thematic categories were assigned to as many categories as seemed appropriate. Therefore, the total frequency of content themes exceeds that of the total number of articles analyzed. Title themes were assigned to only a single thematic category. If the theme of the article was uncertain, it was assigned to the "unclear" category. Because of this difference in recording frequencies between title and content themes, it was impossible to do a direct correlation between the two. However, the format of Table IV does allow for comparison of frequencies between title and content themes for each thematic category.

A metaphorical analysis was conducted as a component of the content analysis of article titles. This methodological approach has been used by several other investigators, most recently in a study examining the nature of drugs and drug-taking.⁹ The use of metaphors and symbols pervades newspaper headlines. They provide a description of an issue or event in terms other than those commonly used to describe it. For example, an article title which reads "Heroin Abuse Spreads Like a Plague Across the Nation" makes use of a metaphorical description. The same title without the use of a metaphor might read "Heroin Abuse on the Increase Across the Nation." The use of the metaphor "plague" provides a certain degree of fear or menace that is associated with an actual plague. Our decision to analyze these article titles in terms of metaphors was based on just such a potential public reaction. Stereotypes or biases about heroin can be based as much on the metaphors employed in article titles as they can on the actual content of the titles.

RESULTS

Although the articles analyzed date back to 1965, the vast majority of articles, 96.3 percent, were published between 1980 and 1991 (see Table II). Consequently, our results are more representative of public exposure during the past decade, than during the previous 15 years. Additionally, it is important to note that all the pre-1980 articles reviewed were from Time and Newsweek, representing a significantly smaller portion of our sample size as compared to the other periodicals.

ARTICLE AUTHORSHIP AND PROMINENCE

Nearly three quarters (73 percent) of the articles reviewed were written by a staff reporter. An additional nine articles were editorials. It is our contention that such a result indicates that the periodical considered the story to be significant enough to assign a staff member to cover it as opposed to relying on the wire services. One reason for this decision could certainly be that the story was of local importance, but considering the periodicals chosen for analysis, this is unlikely. Rather, it is more likely that the issues involved were significant to American society at-large.

Additional data listed in Table III do not suggest a similar degree of importance. Only 3.3 percent of articles appeared either fully, or began, on the front page of the periodical. When those articles which appeared on the first page of a newspaper section were included (17 percent), this total still represented only slightly more than one-fifth (20.3 percent) of all articles reviewed. Similarly, more than three quarters (76.6 percent) of articles were of a length of three columns or less. This data indicates just the opposite of the authorship data, that the issues and stories covered were of lesser importance. This perception is further strengthened upon examination of one additional piece of data. We theorized that articles which held greater prominence would be accompanied by pictures, illustrations and graphs to further explain and/or elaborate the issues discussed in the story. If we are correct in our assumption, then the fact that more than two-thirds (68.8 percent) of the articles studied contained no such embellishment would seem to support a lower level of importance.

One explanation for the mixed results may lie in the differentiation between the decision to cover a story and the subsequent reporting. One might argue that an issue thought to be important enough to send a staff reporter to cover it, may have lost some significance when the story is reported and written. Such an argument is difficult to use, however, to explain such an overwhelming disparity. Still another possible explanation is how the story is covered over time. A new story might break on the first page, but subsequent coverage usually occurs further back in another section.

ARTICLE TITLE AND CONTENT THEMES

The results of the article title and content thematic categorization are listed in Table IV. The predominance of themes, in both the title and content thematic categories, relating to the illicit, as compared to the legitimate use of heroin, represents a significant finding. Less than four percent (1.2 to 3.2 percent) of all articles analyzed had as the theme of their title or content the therapeutic use of heroin either in the treatment of pain or addiction. On the other hand, the theme "Drug Traffickers" was represented in 14.8 percent of the article titles and nearly a third (31.7 percent) of the content of the articles studied. Likewise, the theme "Heroin Possession/Arrests/Raids" was found in more than one quarter (26.9 percent) of title themes, though substantially less (3.9 percent) content themes. When these two categories are combined, they represent 41.7 percent of title themes and 35.6 percent of content themes, by far the greatest plurality of articles.

The question of the decriminalization of heroin and other illicit drugs did receive some discussion in the periodicals studied (2.0 percent title and 5.1 percent content themes), but this was more than offset by the theme "Heroin's Adverse Effects/Deaths/Overdoses" (8.1 percent title and five percent content). This would suggest that although the public has been exposed to some degree of discussion relative to the lessening or eliminating of legal penalties related to substance abuse, it is quickly reminded of the morbidity and mortality these substances cause. At the same time, however, a relatively small number of articles (0.2 percent title and 4.1 percent content) focused on the abuse liability of heroin.

One of the categories created during content analysis, "Heroin Abuse by Widely Known Individuals," showed interesting results. Although only 1.8 percent of the articles were assigned this theme based on their content, a relatively significant number, 5.2 percent, contained this theme in their title. Given the fact that individuals often read only the headlines of newspapers and are more likely to remember an article if a famous name is mentioned, the negative stereotype toward heroin as a result of these titles bears note.

METAPHORS AND SYMBOLS FOR HEROIN IN ARTICLE TITLES

"Heroin: Preparing for a New Invasion," "Busting the Heroin Pipeline," "Europe: The Heroin Plague," "Riding a Mare" and "Washington Struggles to Stem Heroin Tide" represent only a small sample of the article titles analyzed which make use of metaphors and symbols. The results of our metaphorical analysis, summarized in Table V, demonstrate a definite negative connotation relative to heroin. This negative stereotype, as expressed through the metaphors, follows several distinct, undesirable approaches. The first of these, is to associate heroin with things that are bad or evil and to equate it with the devil. The second, provides a medical twist by thinking of heroin symbolically as a disease or plague which ultimately leads to death. A third approach utilizes a war analogy in that it equates fighting heroin abuse to waging a military battle with heroin as the enemy. The fourth visualizes heroin abuse as an ocean wave or tide which cannot be controlled or as a pipeline or other machinery funneling the drug into the country. The final, and in our view most disturbing metaphorical approach, is the use of the racial element. Blaming certain groups for substance abuse or drug trafficking in America plays on and unfortunately reinforces certain biases already existent among the public.

DISCUSSION AND CONCLUSIONS

The results of our study indicate that, in general, heroin has been portrayed by the print media in a very negative manner. In these portraits, this substance has been associated with crime, disease, illicit use and death. There exists a paucity of articles which discuss potential medical benefits relating to the use of heroin as an analgesic. It is therefore reasonable to suggest that the negative reputation of heroin held by society has been reinforced, and quite possibly generated, by mass media.

If in fact our conclusions are valid, what impact has this representation had on the genesis of public policy and a potential therapeutic role for heroin? As mentioned earlier, this paper represents only the first phase of a more complex study examining the issue of policy, ethics and the therapeutic use of heroin. Future papers will examine how the actions of the federal government may be influenced not only by their personal perceptions of heroin, but also by public opinion. A bill to make heroin available for therapeutic use in certain circumstances has been introduced in Congress each session since 1984 (accounting for most all of the articles analyzed that had title or content themes addressing the medicinal use of heroin). Unfortunately, despite the sponsorship of an influential legislator in each House, the bill has not met with success. Has heroin's portrayal in the mass media been contributory?

Both Great Britain and Canada have approved heroin's availability for therapeutic use. We will take a close look at heroin policy and use in these countries and, through in-depth interviews and policy analysis, establish a frame of reference for heroin's history in the United States. Great Britain and Canada differ in both the restrictiveness of their policy toward heroin as well as in the attitudes of health professionals towards its use as an analgesic. They should provide us with a useful contrast.

The final portion of this multi-phase study will examine the moral and ethical obligations of medical professionals, specifically pharmacists, and their professional organizations to patients. There is strong evidence to suggest that these organizations may not have fulfilled their hippocratic responsibilities by opposing medicinal heroin. This evidence can be seen in both Congressional testimony and policy statements in which such groups undertook steps to block the availability of heroin for therapeutic use.

For its part, we hope that this phase of our larger study will assist in understanding how the negative stereotyping of heroin by the public has been influenced by its portrayal in the popular press. And, how that portrayal has prevented its evaluation as a legitimate therapeutic agent by health professionals on a clinical and scientific basis, rather than by society on moral, cultural or political grounds.

A bill to amend title 5, United States Code, to require the issuance of a prisoner-of-war medal to civilian employees of the Federal Government who are forcibly detained or interned by an enemy government or a hostile force under wartime conditions; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

PRISONER-OF-WAR MEDAL FOR CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

• Mr. INOUE. Mr. President, all too often we find that our Nation's civilians who have been captured by a hostile government do not receive the recognition they deserve. My bill would correct this inequity and provide a prisoner-of-war medal for civilian employees of the Federal Government.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 125

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

"(1) by an enemy government or its agents, or a hostile force, during a period of war; or

"(2) by a foreign government or its agents, or a hostile force, during a period other than a period of war in which such person was held under circumstances which the President finds to have been comparable to the circumstances under which members of the armed forces have generally been forcibly detained or interned by enemy governments during periods of war.

"(b) The prisoner-of-war medal shall be of appropriate design, with ribbons and appurtenances.

"(c) Not more than one prisoner-of-war medal may be issued to a person under this section or section 1128 of title 10. However, for each succeeding service that would otherwise justify the issuance of such a medal, the President (in the case of service referred to in subsection (a) of this section) or the Secretary concerned (in the case of service referred to in section 1128(a) of title 10) may issue a suitable device to be worn as determined by the President or such Secretary, as the case may be.

"(d) For a person to be eligible for issuance of a prisoner-of-war medal, the person's conduct must have been honorable for the period of captivity which serves as the basis for the issuance.

S. 126. A bill to amend title VII of the Public Health Service Act to establish a psychology postdoctoral fellowship program, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

THE PSYCHOLOGY POSTDOCTORAL FELLOWSHIP PROGRAM ACT OF 1993

• Mr. INOUE. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today to amend title VII of the Public Health Service Act to establish a psychology postdoctoral fellowship program.

Mr. President, psychologists have made a unique contribution in serving the Nation's medically underserved populations. Expertise in behavioral science is useful in addressing many of our most distressing concerns—violence, addiction, mental illness, children's behavior disorders, family disruption, for example. Establishment of a psychology postdoctoral fellowship program could be most effective in finding solutions to these pressing societal issues.

Similar programs supporting additional, specialized training in traditionally underserved settings or with specific underserved populations have been demonstrated to be successful providing services to those same underserved populations during the years following the training experience. That is, Mr. President, mental health professionals who have participated in these specialized federally funded programs have tended not only to meet their payback obligations, but have continued to work in the public sector or with the underserved populations with whom they have been trained to work.

Mr. President, while the doctorate in psychology provides broad-based knowledge and mastery in a wide variety of clinical skills, the specialized postdoctoral fellowship programs provide particular diagnostic and treatment skills required to effectively respond to these underserved populations. For example, what looks like severe depression in an elderly person may be a withdrawal related to hearing loss, or what looks like poor academic motivation in a child recently relocated from southeast Asia may be reflective of a cultural value of reserve rather than a disinterest in academic learning. Each of these situations requires very different interventions, of course, and specialized assessment skills.

Domestic violence is not just a problem for the criminal justice system, it is a significant public health problem. A single aspect of the issue, domestic violence against women results in almost 100,000 days of hospitalization, 30,000 emergency room visits, and 40,000 visits to physicians each year. Rates of child and spouse abuse in rural areas are particularly high as are the rates of alcohol abuse and depression in adolescents. A postdoctoral fellowship program in the psychology of rural populations could be of special benefit in addressing these pressing issues.

Mr. President, given the changing demographics of the Nation—the increasing lifespan and numbers of the elderly, the rising percentage of minority populations within the country, as well as an increased recognition of the long-term sequelae of violence and abuse and given the demonstrated success and effectiveness of these kinds of specialized training programs, it is incumbent upon us to encourage participation in postdoctoral fellowship programs which respond to the needs of the Nation's underserved.

I request unanimous consent that the text of my bill be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 127. A bill to amend title VII of the Public Health Service Act to make certain graduate programs in clinical psychology eligible to participate in various health professions loan programs, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

HEALTH PROFESSIONS LOAN ACT OF 1993

• Mr. INOUE. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today to modify title VII of the U.S. Public Health Service Act in order to provide students enrolled in graduate psychology programs with the opportunity to participate in various health professions loan programs.

Mr. President, providing students enrolled in graduate psychology programs with eligibility for financial assistance in the form of loans, loan guarantees, and scholarships will facilitate a much needed infusion of behavioral science expertise into our public health efforts. There is a growing recognition of the valuable contribution which is being made by our nation's psychologists toward solving some of our Nation's most distressing problems—domestic violence, addictions, occupational stress, child abuse, depression, for example.

The participation of students of all kinds is vital to the success of health care training, Mr. President. The title VII programs play a significant role in providing financial support for the recruitment of minorities, women, and individuals from economically disadvantaged backgrounds. Minority therapists, for example, have an advantage in the provision of critical services to minority populations because they are more likely to understand or, perhaps, share the cultural background of their clients, often able to communicate with them in their own language. Also significant is the fact that, when compared with nonminority graduates, ethnic minority graduates are less likely to work in private practice and more likely to work in community or nonprofit clinics, where ethnic minority and economically disadvantaged individuals are more likely to seek care.

It is important, Mr. President, that a continued emphasis be placed on the needy populations of our nation and that continued support be provided for the training of individuals who are most likely to provide services in underserved areas.

I request unanimous consent that the text of my bill be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 128. A bill to amend title 10, United States Code, to authorize certain disabled former prisoners of war to use Department of Defense commissary stores and post and base exchanges; to the Committee on Armed Services.

DISABLED FORMER PRISONERS OF WAR ACT OF 1993

• Mr. INOUE. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to enable those former prisoners of war have been separated honorably from their respective services and who have been rated to have a 30-percent service-connected disability to have the use of both the military commissary and post exchange privileges. While I realize that it is impossible to adequately compensate one who has endured long periods of incarceration at the hands of our Nation's enemies, I do feel that this gesture is both meaningful and important to those concerned. It also serves as a reminder that our Nation has not forgotten their sacrifices.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 128

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) chapter 53 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

“§1051. Use of commissary stores and post and base exchanges by certain disabled former members of the armed forces

“(a) In this section—

“(1) ‘former prisoner of war’ has the same meaning as provided in section 101(32) of title 38; and

“(2) ‘service-connected’ has the same meaning as provided in section 101(16) of such title.

“(b)(1) Under regulations prescribed as provided in paragraph (2), a former prisoner of war who—

“(A) has been separated from active service in the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, or the Marine Corps under honorable conditions; and

“(B) has a service-connected disability rated by the Secretary concerned or the Administrator of Veterans Affairs at 30 per centum or more, shall be permitted to use commissary stores and post and base exchanges operating under the Department of Defense.

“(2)(A) The Secretary of Defense shall prescribe regulations to carry out paragraph (1) in the case of commissary stores.

“(B) The Secretary of the military department concerned shall prescribe regulations to carry out paragraph (1) in the case of post or base exchanges operating under the jurisdiction of such military department.”

S. 129. A bill to amend title 10, United States Code, to provide for jurisdiction, apprehension, and detention of members of the Armed Forces and certain civilians accompanying the Armed Forces outside the United States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Armed Services.

JURISDICTION, APPREHENSION AND DETENTION ACT OF 1993

• Mr. INOUE. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill is to fill certain jurisdictional voids involving offenses committed by U.S. nationals abroad. The Supreme Court has held that, at least in peacetime, civilians may not be tried by courts martial for offenses against military law that they may have committed abroad when they were members of the U.S. Armed Forces and when they were serving with, employed by, or accompanying the Armed Forces. Further, under existing statutes, acts committed by U.S. nationals abroad generally do not constitute offenses against any U.S. law even though they would constitute such offenses if they had been committed in this country. Thus, civilian nationals of the United States are generally not accountable to U.S. courts for their conduct abroad.

This bill would remedy this situation for conduct abroad by civilians who, at the time of the acts in question, were members of the Armed Forces or were serving with, employed by, or accompanying the Armed Forces. The bill would generally provide that such conduct would be subject to the same civilian criminal proscriptions that apply in areas under Federal jurisdiction.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 131. A bill to amend title 10, United States Code, to exclude nurse officers from the computation of authorized grade strength; to the Committee on Armed Services.

RESTRUCTURING THE MILITARY NURSES OFFICER CORPS ACT

• Mr. INOUE. Mr. President, on behalf of our Nation's military nurse officers, I am introducing legislation that would allow for the restructuring of the nurse officer corps.

This legislation will permit the nurse officer grade structure to be shaped and governed in such a way that it would generate a variable career path with reasonable upward mobility. Lack of promotions in the nurse corps has created a severe retention problem in the past several years. Like physicians and dentists, nurses provide a unique and indispensable service to our Nation's defense. Removing current grade restrictions would help the Department of Defense compete on a more equitable basis with the civilian community and facilitate their recruitment and retention. The ongoing nationwide shortage of nurses places the Department of Defense at a disadvantage, as mid-career nurses who are denied promotion leave military service for more lucrative careers elsewhere. Their skills and experience are lost for any future national crisis. I believe it is critical to address this problem.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of my bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 132. A bill to amend section 1086 of title 10, United States Code, to provide for payment under CHAMPUS of certain health care expenses incurred by certain members and former members of the uniformed services and their dependents to the extent that such expenses are not payable under Medicare, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Armed Services.

PAYMENT OF CERTAIN HEALTH CARE EXPENSES UNDER CHAMPUS ACT

• Mr. INOUE. Mr. President, I feel that it is very important that our Nation continues its firm commitment to those individuals and their families who have served in the Armed Forces and made us the great Nation that we are today. As this population becomes older, they are unfortunately finding that they need a wider range of health services, some of which are simply not available under Medicare. These individuals made a commitment to their Nation trusting that when they needed help the Nation would honor that commitment. The bill that I am recommending today, would ensure the highest possible quality of care for these dedicated citizens and their families, who gave so much for us.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of my bill be printed in the RECORD.

• Mr. INOUE. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today that would authorize the appointment of various health care professionals to policymaking positions in the Department of Defense. A bill to amend title 10, United States Code, to authorize former members of the Armed Forces who are totally disabled as the result of a service-connected disability to travel on military aircraft in the same manner and to the same extent as retired members of the Armed Forces are entitled to travel on such aircraft; to the Committee on Armed Services.

TRAVEL ON MILITARY AIRCRAFT BY THOSE TOTALLY DISABLED VETERANS ACT

• Mr. INOUE. Mr. President, today I am reintroducing a bill which is of great importance to a group of patriotic Americans. This legislation is designed to extend space-available travel privileges on military aircraft to those who have been totally disabled in the service of our country.

Currently, retired members of the Armed Forces are permitted to travel on space-available basis on non-scheduled military flights within the continental United States and on scheduled overseas flights operated by the Military Airlift Command. My bill would provide the same benefits for 100 percent, service-connected disabled veterans.

Surely, we owe these heroic men and women, who have given so much to our country, a debt of gratitude. Of course, we can never repay them for the sacrifice they have made on behalf of all of us but we can surely try to make their lives more pleasant and fulfilling. One way in which we can help is to extend military travel privileges to these distinguished American veterans. I have received numerous letters from all over the country attesting to the importance attached to this issue by veterans. Therefore, I ask that my colleagues show their concern and join me in saying "thank you" by supporting this legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

CENTRALIZED AUTHORITY FOR ADMINISTERING
CARGO PREFERENCE LAWS ACT

• Mr. INOUE. Mr. President, the legislation I am introducing today would centralize authority in the Secretary of Transportation for administering our cargo preference laws. The background of these laws, the need for them, and the problems which, in my view, necessitate the legislation are succinctly stated in a Journal of Commerce article dated November 18, 1988. While the first printing of this article was several years ago, the background it provides and the light it sheds on our present needs are still pertinent. I ask unanimous consent that the bill and the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That paragraph (2) of section 901(b) of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936 (46 App. U.S.C. 1241(b)), is amended to read as follows:

"(2) The Secretary of Transportation shall have the sole responsibility for determining and designating those programs which are subject to the requirements of this subsection. Every department or agency having responsibility for the programs so designated by the Secretary of Transportation shall administer such programs with respect to this subsection under regulations issued by the Secretary of Transportation. The Secretary of Transportation shall review such administration and shall annually report to the Congress with respect thereto."

CARGO PREFERENCE

What it is.—A series of statutes, going back to 1904, intended to assure U.S.-flag ships a minimum share of cargoes produced by U.S. government programs. It is the oldest U.S. maritime promotional program and while subsidies and financing aids have shrunk over the years, preference has survived.

Background.—The preference laws began by tracking this country's extension of its military and naval power, starting with the Spanish-American War. More recently, they have come to reflect the expansion of government programs extending U.S. economic power and interest abroad.

The Military Transportation Act of 1904 was the first of the preference statutes and its requirement for U.S.-flag vessel use, 100 percent, is the highest.

In 1934 Congress adopted Public Resolution 17 to require that half of the exports financed by the Reconstruction Finance Corp. were to move in U.S.-flag vessels. Later that resolution was made to financing of the Export-Import Bank established originally to facilitate trade with the Soviet Union.

In the early postwar period, Congress acted each year to apply the resolution's 50 percent U.S.-flag share to foreign aid shipments. It permanently inserted the requirement into the 1954 Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act, better known as "Food for Peace" and PL-480.

Public Law 664 in 1961 made clear that preference should benefit and protect all U.S.-flag vessels, not just liners, and that all U.S. programs, including those where non-military agencies procured equipment, materials or commodities for themselves or foreign governments, had to use U.S. flags to the extent of 50 percent.

Importance to carriers.—In the last year for which statistics are available, calendar 1986, U.S.-flag carriers hauled more than 33 million metric tons of preference cargo, somewhat more than the 28.5 million tons of commercial shipments carried that year. As an industry, the revenue amounted to about $502 million.

Necessity for preference.—Preference statutes are formally predicated on the need for assured cargoes to encourage the existence of a U.S.-flag merchant fleet to act as a military auxiliary in times of national emergencies.

Past efforts to apply preference to commercial cargoes have failed, reflecting U.S. governmental sensitivity to objections by this country's trading partners as well as stern opposition from U.S. exporters, importers and agricultural interests. The availability of preference cargoes has unquestionably kept some U.S. carriers in business but critics argue that preference has encouraged keeping obsolete vessels in operation long after they should have been scrapped.

Extent of program.—The Defense Department, the Agriculture Department and the Agency for International Development are the agencies most heavily involved in utilizing shipping and observing cargo preference. But there are at least 10 others with the same cargo preference responsibilities although smaller volumes. The Export-Import Bank in 1987 reported an unusually high, 98 percent rate of U.S.-flag vessel use. It brought participating carriers some $14.5 million in revenue.

Problems.—The Maritime Administration is responsible for monitoring other government agencies to try to make sure they live up to preference requirements. In fiscal year 1987, those agencies met the cargo share minimums for the most part. Among the exceptions were cases in which the cargo origins and destinations were such that U.S.-flag vessels were simply not available.

Despite administration pledges to honor cargo preference requirements, the Navy and the Agriculture Department have had a number of preference fights with the maritime industry.

One produced an agreement by which the carriers agreed to forgo preference claims on new Agriculture Department-supported export programs with commercial-like terms in return for increasing to 75 percent their share of "giveaway" relief food shipments.

In another such dispute, the Navy and the U.S. State Department were forced to negotiate a cargosharing agreement with Iceland for military shipments there. Iceland threatened the future of U.S. bases in that country if the United States didn't agree to a departure from 100 percent U.S.-flag carriage of defense shipments.

There have been other, largely budget-driven attempts to bypass preference, but carriers and their supporters in Congress generally have managed to forestall them.

Comment.—Budgetary austerity and the Defense Department's strict insistence of competitive procurement have combined to make for increasing carrier dissatisfaction, especially with the Navy's Military Sealift Command.

Efforts already are underway to change the competitive procurement system the command uses. Carriers hope generally, to end the pressures they believe force rates downward to depressed levels.

The presidentially appointed Commission on Merchant Marine and Defense has recommended that all U.S.-flag preference requirements programs be raised to 100 percent but the tight budget and such interests as farmers and traders will work against such a step. Agricultural interests have tried unsuccessfully to have existing preference removed from Government programs in the belief that they inhibit U.S. farm exports. •

TAX CREDIT FOR CHILD RESTRAINT SYSTEMS IN MOTOR VEHICLES ACT

• Mr. INOUE. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to provide for a Federal income tax credit for those families who purchase a child restraint system for their automobiles.

Accidents and injuries continue to cause almost half of the deaths by children between the ages of 1 and 4, more than half the deaths of children between 5 and 15, and continue to be the leading cause of death among children and young adults.

It is my understanding that although the Department of Transportation had made injury prevention among children a top priority, a significant number of parents who do have child restraint systems do not have them installed properly.

Mr. President, it is imperative that we create this opportunity to provide America's parents with a financially accessible alternative to the insufficient level of child safety measures currently used in automobiles.

S. 137. A bill to require the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency to conduct a study of algal blooms off the coast of Maui, Hawaii, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

GRANT PROGRAM TO STUDY ALGAL BLOOMS IN MAUI, HAWAII

● Mr. INOUE. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today which will enable the Environmental Protection Agency to establish a grant program to investigate the unexplained occurrence of algal blooms off the northwestern coast of Maui, Hawaii.

Twice since 1989, portions of Hawaii's most treasured coastal areas have been plagued with massive algal blooms. Although the specific causes of the algal blooms are uncertain, algal growth is proportionally stimulated by the injection of treated waste water and concentrations of chemicals such as fertilizers and insecticides which enter the ocean through fresh water runoff.

Mr. President, I feel it is my duty to act in an efficient and timely manner to ensure that the affected coastal areas do not suffer further environmental damage. Already, coral reefs which have been exposed to the algal blooms have died; this is an occurrence that holds far-reaching effects for fish and other wildlife who depend on the reefs for survival.

In addition to solving the specific problem of the algal blooms, it is my sincere hope that this legislation will encourage the State of Hawaii to research alternative methods of managing the presence of chemicals in waste water effluent and fresh water runoff.

I am confident that this pledge of support for an inquiry into the causes of the algal blooms will complement the efforts of the State of Hawaii to eradicate this environmental hazard. My endeavor to obtain funding for this important legislation has been buttressed by my understanding that the State of Hawaii has already pledged substantial funding to coincide with the Federal effort on its behalf. Our immediate action and additional assistance are crucial if we are to halt the further deterioration of the affected coastal areas.

I request unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 137

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. FINDINGS.

Congress finds the following:

(1) Twice since 1989, the northwestern coast of Maui, Hawaii, has been plagued with massive blooms of the green alga, Cladophora sericea. Blooms of the red alga, Hypnea musciformis, have also occurred in the area and in the Kihei area.

(2) The algal blooms have destroyed corals and other reef-building organisms, and have washed up on beaches and severely impeded the recreational use of affected coastal areas.

(3) The algal blooms are particularly detrimental to the natural ecological balance of the near-shore reef environment.

(4) Although the specific causes of the algal blooms are uncertain, algal growth is stimulated in a proportional manner by concentrations of chemicals such as fertilizers and insecticides, which enter the ocean through freshwater runoff.

(5) The Department of Health of the State of Hawaii has indicated that the department does not have the resources at this time to determine the cause of the algal blooms.

(6) Extensive research will be required to determine the factors that contribute to algal growth.

(7) Potential sources of nutrients that may contribute to algal growth include the near-shore disposal of sewage in injection wells from the Lahaina Wastewater Treatment Plant, surface runoff from agricultural lands and urban resort areas, and subsurface point sources in the areas.

(8) The long-term environmental impacts of the algal blooms are unknown, but in the short term, reefs exposed to the algae are being destroyed and the deterioration of the coral has detrimental effects on fish and other wildlife that depend on the reefs for survival.

(9) The algal blooms are generating negative economic impacts as well as negative biological impacts, as additional reports indicate that the algae are decreasing the intake of fish caught by local fishermen in the affected marine waters.

(10) The Maui Algae Task Force is comprised of community environmental activists and has been assembled to address the problem of algal blooms.

(11) The Maui Algae Task Force hopes to work in cooperation with the Department of Health of the State of Hawaii and the Environmental Protection Agency to identify and eradicate the causes of the algal blooms.

SEC. 2. STUDY.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency (hereafter in this Act referred to as the "Administrator") shall conduct a study to—

(1) determine the causes of recent algal blooms off the northwestern coast of Maui, Hawaii; and

(2) research alternatives for the improved management of chemicals present in wastewater treatment and fresh water runoff.

(b) STUDY REQUIREMENTS.—In carrying out the study under this section, the Administrator shall—

(1) survey and monitor—

(A) seaweed populations and animals for which the seaweed is a food source;

(B) surface water runoff sediments in the study area; and

(C) inputs into the study area from subsurface point sources, including any such inputs from the Lahaina wastewater treatment plant; and

(2) study the responses of—

(A) the seaweed populations referred to in paragraph (1)(A) to different concentrations of nutrients; and

(B) the animals referred to in paragraph (1)(A) to pesticides and other biological toxins.

(c) EQUIPMENT; GRANTS.—

(1) ACQUISITION OF EQUIPMENT.—In carrying out the study under this section, the Administrator is authorized to acquire such monitoring and testing equipment as the Administrator determines necessary.

(2) GRANTS.—In carrying out the study under this section, the Administrator is authorized to establish a grant program to provide grants to eligible entities that submit approved applications to the Administrator.

The following entities may submit an application to conduct study activities under this section:

(A) The Department of Health of the State of Hawaii.

(B) The Maui Algae Task Force.

(C) Appropriate Federal, State, or county departments or agencies.

(D) Any other entity that the Administrator determines to be appropriate.

(d) DEMONSTRATION PROJECTS.—In carrying out the study under this section, the Administrator is authorized to establish demonstration projects to identify and implement best management practices for the control of nonpoint source pollution from erosion and agricultural runoff.

(e) REPORTS.—

(1) INTERIM REPORT.—Not later than 1 year after the date of enactment of this Act, the Administrator shall submit to Congress a report that includes interim results of the study conducted under this section, and such recommendations as the Administrator determines to be appropriate.

(2) FINAL REPORT.—Not later than January 31, 1996, the Administrator shall submit to Congress a final report that summarizes the results of the study conducted under this section and includes such recommendations as the Administrator determines to be appropriate.

(f) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—There are authorized to be appropriated to the Environmental Protection Agency to carry out this section $500,000 for each of fiscal years 1994 and 1995. •

WAIVER OF SIZE STANDARDS FOR SBA INJURY DISASTER LOAN PROGRAM

• Mr. INOUE. Mr. President, a little over 4 months have passed since Hurricane Iniki struck the State of Hawaii. The Island of Kauai suffered the brunt of Iniki's fury, leaving thousands homeless and hundreds of businesses destroyed.

Damage to private property is estimated at $1.5 billion, $1.45 billion on Kauai alone. Damage to public property is estimated at $142 million, $139 million of which is on Kauai.

The anguish I witnessed of victims who lose their homes and businesses continues. The road to recovery has been slow and difficult. Living on an island, in an island State, the victims of Hurricane Iniki are not readily mobile. Kauai's economic well-being is in very critical condition.

During the debate on the fiscal year 1992 supplemental appropriations bill, I indicated on the Senate floor that the full extent of the damage caused by Hurricane Iniki was not known, and advised my colleagues that I may request further disaster relief assistance as circumstances warranted.

The full extent of the damage is only now becoming evident. Continued Federal support for hurricane recovery efforts is critical. Accordingly, I will be seeking additional funds to help the victims of Hurricane Iniki in the first available supplemental appropriations measure.

In addition to my plans to seek more funds, I am introducing a number of measures today to ensure better access to disaster relief funds.

To assist medium-sized businesses affected by the hurricane, I am introducing legislation to waive the size standards of the Small Business Administration's [SBA] Injury Disaster Loan Program to make more businesses eligible for these loans. This measure will also allow media interests to qualify for SBA loans to rebuild its facilities after natural disasters. Current law prohibits SBA loans to media interests in order to avoid governmental interference, or the appearance of government interference with the constitutionally protected freedoms of speech and press.

To assist in the recovery of our tourism industry, I am introducing a measure to lift the monetary cap on annual grants to States from the U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration [USTTA]. Tourism grants from the USTTA are currently limited to a maximum of $1.2 million each fiscal year.

To assist in rebuilding our agriculture industry, I am introducing legislation to waive certain restrictions on disaster assistance for agricultural losses. My measure proposes to waive limitations on Commodity Credit Corporation and Tree Assistance Programs and the very low income limitation for loans and grants to repair rural dwellings. In addition, my measure authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to waive limitations as appropriate to serve and assist those devastated by Hurricane Iniki. My measure also extends to the State of Hawaii expanded Federal contribution limits for hazard mitigation applicable to the insular areas, and redefines crop year to accommodate multiyear crops.

Hurricane Iniki created substantially increased demands on the State Health Insurance Program administered by the State of Hawaii. To help meet the increased cost burdens, I am introducing legislation which provides that the State Health Insurance Program is eligible for reimbursement from funds appropriated to the Public Health and Social Services Emergency Fund.

To assist homebuyers, I am introducing a measure to extend to 4 years the period for the rollover of a gain from the sale of a principal residence to a principal residence located, or to be located in a qualified disaster area designated subsequent to the sale of the taxpayer's old residence.

Finally, I am introducing a measure to restore the application of the Davis-Bacon Act to Federal contracts in Hawaii. On October 14, 1992 President Bush issued a proclamation suspending provisions of the Davis-Bacon Act to "help speed up and lower the cost of rebuilding the communities ravaged by Hurricanes Andrew and Iniki." While the suspension applies only to designated areas that were directly affected by Hurricane Iniki, the U.S. Department of Labor has interpreted the proclamation to apply to all Federal contracts that are subject to the Davis-Bacon Act, regardless of whether the contract relates to hurricane recovery. As you can imagine, the impact of this proclamation has been devastating.

Mr. President, I am committed to taking the necessary steps to ensure that the victims of Hurricane Iniki fully recover from its devastation. I hope I can count on the continued support of my Senate colleagues for the people of Hawaii.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of my measures be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 144

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

- (1) the size of the qualifying business;
- (2) the availability to that business of non-Federal sources of credit; or
- (3) the maximum amount of assistance established under that section or regulations issued thereunder.

SEC. 2. QUALIFYING BUSINESSES.

For purposes of this Act, a qualifying business is—

- (1) a regulated public utility company, if—

(A) the disaster area is more than 1,000 miles from the major sources of materials and supplies necessary to restore the public utility to full operating service;

(B) the public utility is not physically connected to any other public utility service that can provide the same type of services to customers of the affected public utility company;

(C) the cost to repair, reconstruct, and restore the facilities of the public utility company is equal to not less than 20 percent of the dollar value of its facilities prior to the occurrence of the disaster; and

(D) the regulated public utility had not more than 500,000 customers at the time of the disaster;

(2) an interstate transportation service provider operating in the disaster area, if—

(A) such provider is the only transportation link to the areas affected by the disaster, other than by carriage over water; and

(B) assistance provided in accordance with this Act and section 7(b)(2) of the Small Business Act will be used to finance repair, reconstruction, and restoration of the provider's facilities as they existed prior to the occurrence of the disaster; and

(3) any communications media business, the facilities of which were damaged or destroyed by Hurricane Andrew, Hurricane Iniki, or Typhoon Omar (including all such facilities related to the gathering, printing, or dissemination of information).

SEC. 3. DEFINITIONS.

For purposes of this Act—

(1) the term "regulated public utility" means a corporation engaged in the furnishing of telephone service or in the sale of electrical energy, gas, or water, if the rates for such furnishing or sale, as the case may be, have been established or approved by a State or political subdivision thereof or by an agency or instrumentality of the United States or by a public utility or public service commission or other similar body of the District of Columbia, Guam, or of any State or political subdivision thereof; and

(2) the term "disaster area" means any area affected by a major disaster, as declared by the President in accordance with section 401 of the Robert T. Stafford Disaster Relief and Emergency Assistance Act, as a result of the occurrences of Hurricane Andrew, Hurricane Iniki, or Typhoon Omar.●

S. 145. A bill to amend chapter 74 of title 38, United States Code, to revise certain provisions relating to the appointment of clinical and counseling psychologists in the Veterans Health Administration, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

HYBRID TITLE 38 ACT

● Mr. INOUE. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today to amend chapter 74 of title 38, United States Code, to revise certain provisions relating to the appointment of clinical and counseling psychologists in the Veterans Health Administration.

Mr. President, the Veterans Health Administration has a long history of maintaining a staff of the very best health care professionals to provide care to those men and women who have served their country in the Armed Forces. It is certainly fitting that this should be done.

Recently a quite distressing situation regarding the care of our veterans has come to my attention, that the recruitment and retention of psychologists in the Veterans Health Administration of the Department of Veterans Affairs has become a significant problem.

Mr. President, the Congress has recognized the important contribution of the behavioral sciences in the treatment of several conditions from which a significant proportion of our veterans suffer. For example, programs related to homelessness, substance abuse, and post traumatic stress disorder were funded in fiscal year 1990.

Certainly, psychologists as behavioral science experts are essential to the successful implementation of these programs. However the high vacancy and turnover rates for psychologists in the Veterans Health Administration [VHA]—over 11 percent and 18 percent, respectively, as reported in one recent survey—may seriously jeopardize these programs and will negatively impact overall patient care in the VHA.

Recruitment of psychologists by the VHA is hindered by a number of factors including a pay scale not commensurate with private sector rates of pay as well as by the low numbers of clinical and counseling psychologists appearing on the register of the Office of Personnel Management [OPM]. Most new hires have no postdoctoral experience and are hired immediately after a VA internship. Recruitment, when successful, averages 6 months or more.

Retention of psychologists in the VA system poses an even more significant problem, Mr. President. In 1990, almost 40 percent of VHA psychologists had 5 years or less of postdoctoral experience. Without doubt, our veterans would benefit from a higher percentage of senior staff who are more experienced in working with veterans and their particular concerns.

Several factors are associated with the difficulties in retention of VHA psychologists including low salaries and lack of career advancement opportunities. It seems that psychologists are apt to leave the VA system after 5 years because they have almost reached the peak levels for salary and professional development in the VHA. Furthermore, under the present system, psychologists cannot be recognized or appropriately compensated for excellence or for taking on additional responsibilities such as running treatment programs.

In effect, Mr. President, the current system for hiring psychologists in the Veterans Health Administration supports mediocrity, not excellence and mastery. Mr. President, our veterans with behavioral disorders and mental health problems are deserving of better psychological care from more experienced professionals than they are currently receiving.

Mr. President, a hybrid title 38 appointment authority for psychologists would help ameliorate the recruitment and retention problems in several ways. The length of time it takes to recruit psychologists could be abbreviated by eliminating the requirement for applicants to be rated by the Office of Personnel Management. This would also facilitate the recruitment of applicants who are not recent VA interns by reducing the amount of time between identifying a desirable applicant and being able to offer that applicant a position.

It is expected that problems in retention of behavioral science experts will be greatly alleviated with the implementation of hybrid title 38 system for VA psychologists, primarily through offering financial incentives for psychologists to pursue professional development within the VA. Achievements which would merit salary increases under title 38 should include such activities as assuming supervisory responsibilities for clinical programs, implementing innovative clinical treatments which improve the effectiveness and/or efficiency of patient care, making significant contributions to the science of psychology, earning the ABPP diplomate status, becoming a fellow of the American Psychological Association.

Mr. President, currently psychologists are the only doctoral level health care providers in the Veterans Health Administration who are not included in title 38. This is, without question, a significant factor in the recruitment and retention difficulties which I have addressed. Ultimately, an across-the-board salary increase may be necessary. However, the conversion of psychologists to a hybrid title 38, as proposed by this amendment, would provide relief for these difficulties and enhance the quality of care for our Nation's veterans and their families.

I request unanimous consent that the text of my bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 145

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 7401(3) of title 38, United States Code, is amended by striking out "who hold diplomas as diplomates in psychology from an accrediting authority approved by the Secretary".

(b) CERTAIN OTHER APPOINTMENTS.—Section 7405(a) of such title is amended—

(1) in paragraph (1)(B), by striking out "Certified or" and inserting in lieu thereof "Clinical or counseling psychologists, certified or"; and

(2) in paragraph (2)(B), by striking out "Certified or" and inserting in lieu thereof

"Clinical or counseling psychologists, certified or".

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by subsections (a) and (b) shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act.

(d) APPOINTMENT REQUIREMENT.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of Veterans Affairs shall begin to make appointments of clinical and counseling psychologists in the Veterans Health Administration under section 7401(3) of title 38, United States Code (as amended by subsection (a)), not later than 1 year after the date of the enactment of this Act.●

S. 146. A bill to require that all Government records that contain information bearing on the last flight and disappearance of Amelia Earhart be transmitted to the Library of Congress and made available to the public; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

TRANSFER OF AMELIA EARHART RECORDS TO THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

● Mr. INOUE. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation calling for the declassification of any material relating to the disappearance of Amelia Earhart that is still classified as Government secrets.

Amelia Earhart was a true heroine to millions of Americans in the 1930's. One of the world's most famous aviatrixes, she disappeared along with her navigator, Fred Noonan, while on a well-known attempt to circumnavigate the globe in 1937. While it is thought by many that she was lost at sea, there is still much to be learned about her disappearance and as a story in the New York Times from last year shows, interest in this unsolved mystery still exists.

Therefore, I am introducing the following legislation and ask that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 146

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. DEFINITIONS.

In this Act, "Executive agency" has the meaning stated in section 105 of title 5, United States Code.

SEC. 2. IDENTIFICATION AND TRANSMITTAL OF RECORDS.

By not later than the date that is 90 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the head of each Executive agency shall—

(1) conduct a search of all records in the control of the agency to identify each record that contains information that is relevant to—

(A) the last flight of Amelia Earhart; (B) the mechanical, navigational, meteorological, or other problems that caused the end of that flight; and

(C) the whereabouts of Amelia Earhart and her navigator, Fred Noonan and their airplane, following their disappearance;

(2) declassify any such relevant records that have been classified as Government secrets; and

(3) transmit all such relevant records to the Librarian of Congress.

SEC. 3. PUBLIC AVAILABILITY OF RECORDS.

By not later than the date that is 180 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Librarian of Congress shall create an index of records transmitted to the Librarian under section 2 and make the index and records available to the public.*

S. 148. A bill to amend section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930 and title 28 of the United States Code to provide effective procedures to deal with unfair practices in import trade and to conform section 337 and title 28 to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. ROCKEFELLER (for himself, Ms. MIKULSKI, Mr. HATCH, and Mr. WOFFORD):

S. 149. A bill to amend section 182 of the Trade Act of 1974 to permit the United States to respond to the actions of countries that do not provide adequate and effective patent protection to U.S. nationals.

INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY PROTECTION ACT OF 1993 AND INTERNATIONAL PROTECTION OF PATENTS RIGHTS ACT OF 1993

• Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, many times over the past several years—here on the Senate floor, in the Trade Subcommittee, in the Science, Technology, and Space Subcommittee, in the Foreign Commerce and Tourism Subcommittee, as well as in other public speeches and in private meetings—I have stated my conviction that the protection of intellectual property rights is one of the most important trade issues facing U.S. businesses around the world at the present time. Intellectual property is the technology that determines our national income, our social well-being, and our international competitiveness. When the intellectual property of Americans is not protected anywhere in the world, our country loses not only jobs, production, and profits today, but we also lose our ability to undertake the research and the investments that lead to further technological progress and additional jobs for Americans tomorrow.

The improper use of a company's creativity, its name, and its reputation is theft that can cost the company the many millions of dollars it spent developing a patentable invention or an innovative computer software program. If a company cannot sell its product and recoup its research and development costs, the next product will not be researched and developed. The degree to which we protect intellectual property rights in the United States and the degree to which we ensure commensurate protection in other countries go to the heart of our ability to maintain a successful industrial society.

Mr. President, I am pleased to be joined today by my colleagues Senator MIKULSKI, Senator HATCH, and Senator WOFFORD in sponsoring one or both of the two bills that I am introducing today to address, from different perspectives, this critical trade issue. I hope that these bills will receive very serious consideration and early approval. When they are approved, these proposals will help ensure that foreign companies cannot steal U.S. technology and then use that stolen property to compete against the rightful owners. With this protection against intellectual property rights infringement, U.S. competitiveness can be enhanced and U.S. jobs can be preserved and increased.

One of these bills—the Intellectual Property Protection Act of 1993—addresses this critical trade issue through a reform of section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930. That law gives the U.S. International Trade Commission authority to exclude imports that violate U.S. copyright, patent, trademark, and computer chip mask work registrations or that injure U.S. industry by unfair methods of competition. It is one of the most important laws available to U.S. businesses to enforce intellectual property rights against infringing imports and to deal with other unfair trade practices. My preference would have been to maintain this law in its current form, but the status quo is a choice we may no longer have.

On November 23, 1988, a GATT panel found section 337 to be in violation of U.S. obligations under the GATT because some procedures established by section 337 do not provide national treatment for imported goods, and because some aspects of these procedures were not necessary for effective enforcement of a GATT-consistent law. In that decision, national treatment was the first GATT test; "necessary for enforcement of an otherwise GATT-consistent provision" was the permitted exception to that test.

On November 7, 1989, the U.S. Government allowed adoption of the GATT panel report and thus undertook a commitment to reform section 337 to comply with our GATT obligations. The U.S. Trade Representative has not yet proposed a reform of section 337 in order to meet this commitment. USTR had hoped to introduce such a proposal as part of the Uruguay round implementing legislation.

Well, Mr. President, the Uruguay round negotiations have dragged on for 7 years now, and despite periodic flurries of activity there is still no end in sight. However, other nations will not let us wait forever to comply with our international obligations. As long as this issue is unresolved, other proposals will be made that would do great damage to our ability to protect our industry against infringing imports. Therefore, I believe we may have no choice but to act now to remove any uncertainty about the continued effectiveness of this important law. As a result of this uncertainty, the use of section 337 by U.S. companies has declined since 1989.

In summary, the problem faced by the United States as we try to meet our GATT obligations, while at the same time maintaining an effective enforcement process against illegal imports, is that our Federal district courts cannot provide efficient adjudication of import issues because each district court normally exercises jurisdiction only over persons found within the district. Because of the need in import cases to exercise far-flung jurisdiction—often in several foreign countries and in several States—that is not customary in district court proceedings, section 337 was written 70 years ago to give the ITC the necessary authority: in rem jurisdiction for the entire country and border enforcement of its exclusion orders by the U.S. Customs Service.

In rem jurisdiction is authority over a thing, the imported product itself, rather than over a person. Because of the difficulty of enforcing intellectual property rights against products which are manufactured outside the normal jurisdiction of U.S. courts, these special enforcement procedures are necessary to enforce intellectual property rights against infringing imports at the U.S. border. The GATT allows such special enforcement procedures when they are no less favorable than those used against domestic products or, if less favorable, they are necessary to secure compliance with GATT-consistent regulations or procedures. Some parts of section 337 did not meet this test.

The GATT panel did recognize as necessary the ITC's in rem jurisdiction and the automatic enforcement of its orders against illegal imports by the U.S. Customs Service. However, the GATT panel judged the following special enforcement procedures of section 337—those that are different from the analogous processes in district courts—to be not necessary, and therefore to be not permitted.

First, the statutory time limits in the ITC process. There are no time limits imposed by statutes on the courts nor, given the constitutionally established independence of our judiciary, do I believe we can in the Congress impose any such time limits.

Second, the lack of a provision for counterclaims in the ITC process. Counterclaims are allowed by the courts in intellectual property causes.

Third, the broad availability in the ITC process of general exclusion orders against imported articles. There is no counterpart in courts' actions against domestic infringers.

Fourth, the availability to U.S. firms of two fora—the ITC and the courts—to challenge imports with only a single forum available to challenge alleged domestic infringement. Under current law, only a U.S. industry can bring a section 337 complaint to the ITC, and Fifth, possible duplicative proceedings in the ITC and a district court. A respondent in a section 337 case may have to defend in two fora, often at the same time, whereas a domestic respondent has only a court case to answer.

The bill which Senator HATCH, Senator WOFFORD, and I are introducing today addresses each of these issues, making those changes necessary to comply with our GATT obligations, while fully maintaining the ITC's ability to act quickly and effectively against violations of U.S. intellectual property rights and other unfair trade practices. This is the approach I believe we should adopt. It has very broad support in the U.S. business and legal communities. In preparing this bill, I have consulted extensively with representatives of U.S. industry and with the lawyers who specialize in intellectual property protection issues. As a result of that work, a broad consensus has developed that the approach taken by this bill is the proper way to go.

Mr. President, I would like to share with the Senate two of the reactions on this approach to the reform of section 337 that I received from U.S. business and legal communities. In response to these reactions, the 1993 version of the bill which I am introducing today contains some minor modifications to S. 3172, the bill I introduced last year. The first letter is from Thomas V. Heyman, the president of the ITC Trial Lawyers Association. Mr. Heyman, on behalf of the group he heads, wrote,

For the following reasons, we believe your approach will well serve the interests of the United States while meeting this country's GATT's obligations to our trading partners * * *. While the United States must react to the GATT decision, it should not overreact. It should not change its patent enforcement system. It should not change the focus of Section 337 from an import relief statute to an alternative form of preliminary injunctive relief in connection with imported goods. It should not sacrifice the ability to obtain expeditious relief in the vast majority of cases. It should not trade the flexibility of administrative proceedings for the rigidity of district court rules. What it should do is what your bill proposes—the minimum necessary to preserve the advantages of Section 337 while meeting U.S. international obligations.

Mr. Heyman goes on to examine the specific provisions of the bill in some detail and then writes,

In conclusion, our Association believes that your proposed legislation will serve to solve the long-standing GATT issue regarding Section 337 in a manner that will not only be supported by U.S. industry, but will bring this country into compliance with its international obligations.

Mr. President, the second document I would like to share with my colleagues is an endorsement of this reform effort that I received from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. Mr. William T. Archey, the chamber's senior vice president for policy and congressional affairs, wrote on behalf of the chamber,

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce Federation of local and state chambers of commerce, businesses, and associations strongly supports Section 337 as a proven and effective remedy against the import of goods by those who seek to benefit unfairly from American inventiveness. On March 23, 1990, the Task Force wrote to the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative in response to a Federal Register Notice request and offered suggestions for amending Section 337 * * *. The Task Force reviewed S. 3172 since its introduction and has concluded that the bill substantially accords with the position the Task Force communicated to the Trade Representative.

Mr. President, I will ask unanimous consent that the full text of the ITC Trial Lawyers Association letter and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce letter be printed at the conclusion of my remarks about this legislation. I also expect to receive similar assessments from other representative industry and legal groups in the near future, which I will also share with Senators. I also want to comment on a very important issue that Bill Archey raised in his letter. He wrote,

A major concern by industry is that actions under Section 337 continue to be expeditiously handled, and we are pleased to note that S. 3172 speaks of this issue and calls for the International Trade Commission to establish target dates for completion of its investigations under Section 337. We strongly recommend that the legislative history for S. 3172 emphasize this aspect of the bill and give specific indications of the times that Congress would give specific indications of the times that Congress would consider reasonable for the Commission's target dates, which in our view should continue to be the 12-month and 18-month times that are currently required under the statute.

As part of the legislative history to which Bill Archey refers, in this case the legislative history of the bill I am introducing now as the successor to S. 3172, my statement today will clearly indicate that I believe that the removal of the statutory time limits from section 337—something the United States is required to do to comply with our GATT obligations—should not, and indeed will not, result in the determinations of the U.S. International Trade Commission taking any longer than they have in the past. There are three specific reasons for this belief.

First, my amendment to section 337 does not in any way change the strict 90-day or 150-day time limits on the Commission's determinations with respect to petitions for temporary exclusion orders. Furthermore, my proposal that a temporary exclusion order be enforced by the posting of a bond in an amount determined by the Commission to be sufficient to protect the complainant from any injury will make these temporary exclusion orders even more effective than they were previously. These temporary orders, which can remain in place until a final determination is made, were found by the GATT panel to be consistent with our obligations.

Second, the language I have proposed for the timing of the Commission's final determinations says:

The Commission shall conclude any such investigation and make its determination under this section at the earliest practicable time after the date of publication of notice of such investigation.

The Commission has repeatedly and consistently demonstrated that it is practicable for it to conclude investigations and make determinations within 12 months, or within 18 months in especially complicated cases. This historical record clearly sets the standard for the earliest practicable time that I expect the Commission to maintain.

It is also my understanding, from the consultations which have gone into drafting this bill, that it is the intention of current commissioners to maintain this standard. I am also confident that when new commissioners are nominated, the Senate Finance Committee will ask them during their confirmation hearings to commit themselves to maintaining the current standard.

Third, to ensure the Commission can maintain this standard, my amendment states: "To promote expeditious adjudication, the Commission shall, within 30 days of the initiation of an investigation, establish a target date for its final determination." The use of a specific timeframe for the setting of a target date is a standard practice in district courts under rule 16 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. It is the judgment of current and former U.S. International Trade Commission officials that the Commission can easily meet the 30 days the legislation gives it to establish a target date.

For these reasons, I do not expect these target dates to be any later than the 12- to 18-month deadlines now in the statute. In fact, because the U.S. International Trade Commission has repeatedly and consistently demonstrated that it can finish its work before those deadlines, I anticipate that the target dates established by the Commission can be well within those deadlines.

Mr. President, I hope this statement, which I am making explicitly to establish clearly in the legislative record what the Intelligence Property Act of 1993 means, will help move this proposal very rapidly in the 103d Congress.

The reform of section 337 is not merely an academic exercise. The use of the ITC's section 337 process has fallen significantly since the USTR acquiesced in the adoption of the GATT panel report. I have been told by U.S. businesses that the drop in such cases is not due to greater respect by foreign companies for U.S. intellectual property rights. Rather, it is because some potential U.S. complainants fear that any determination they obtained in the ITC could be invalid because the U.S. Government has accepted the GATT ruling against the current procedures, or that an investigation could be stopped part way through, after a great deal of time and money had been spent, when the rules change.

Mr. President, this is an untenable situation. The protection of the intellectual property rights of U.S. businesses—their copyright, patent, trademark, and computer chip mask work registrations—is too important. Section 337 is an important law, one of the most effective available to U.S. businesses to enforce intellectual property rights against infringing imports and to deal with other unfair trade practices. With the enactment of the bill I am introducing today, we can maintain and reinforce the authority section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930 gives the U.S. International Trade Commission to enforce intellectual property rights against infringing imports and to deal with other unfair trade practices.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the ITC Trial Lawyers Association letter and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce letter, as well as the full text of the proposed Intellectual Property Protection Act of 1993 be printed at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 148

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Intellectual Property Protection Act of 1993".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSE.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds the following:

(1) Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1337) is one of the most important laws available to United States businesses to deal with unfair practices in import trade and to enforce intellectual property rights against infringing imports.

(2) On November 23, 1988, a panel of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (hereafter in this Act referred to as "GATT") found section 337 to be in violation of United States obligations under the GATT, because certain procedures under section 337 did not provide national treatment for imported goods and because some aspects of the procedures were unnecessary for effective compliance with United States patent law.

(3) On November 7, 1989, the United States allowed adoption of the GATT panel report on section 337, thereby assuming an obligation to reform section 337 to comply with its obligations under the GATT.

(4) Because of the special difficulties in enforcing intellectual property rights against unfairly traded imports, special enforcement procedures that apply only to imports are necessary to effectively enforce intellectual property rights against infringing imports.

(5) The GATT allows special enforcement procedures when such procedures are not less favorable than the procedures used against domestic products or such procedures are necessary to secure compliance with copyright, patent, trademark, and mask work registration protection laws or regulations.

(6) To be effective, such enforcement procedures must establish administrative proceedings which can reach multiple parties in one forum, allow efficient foreign discovery, provide expeditious dispute resolution, and provide border enforcement by the United States Customs Service.

(b) PURPOSE.—The purpose of this Act is to conform section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930 and title 28 of the United States Code to the provisions of the GATT to ensure that section 337 procedures can reach multiple parties in one forum, allow efficient foreign discovery, provide expeditious dispute resolution even in the absence of a deadline for final determinations, and provide border enforcement of determinations.

SEC. 3. AMENDMENT OF SECTION 337 OF THE TARIFF ACT OF 1930.

(a) INVESTIGATION.—Section 337(b) of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1337(b)) is amended—

(1) by striking "TIME LIMITS" in the heading;

(2) in paragraph (1), by striking "The Commission shall conclude any such investigation" and all that follows through the end period and inserting the following: "The Commission shall conclude any such investigation and make its determination under this section at the earliest practicable time after the date of publication of notice of such investigation. To promote expeditious adjudication, the Commission shall, within 30 days of the initiation of an investigation, establish a target date for its final determination."; and

(3) by striking the fifth sentence in paragraph (3).

(b) DETERMINATION; REVIEW.—Section 337(c) of such Act is amended—

(1) by striking "a settlement agreement" in the first sentence and inserting "an agreement between the parties";

(3) by striking "(f), or (g)" in the fourth sentence and inserting "(f), (g), or (o)".

(c) EXCLUSION OF ARTICLES FROM ENTRY.—Section 337(d) of such Act is amended by inserting after the first sentence the following new sentence: "No article shall be excluded from entry where the Commission determines that the owner, importer, or consignee of the article has established a sufficient counterclaim directly related to the unfair methods or acts determined by the Commission to exist."

If the Commission later determines that the respondent has not violated the provisions of this section, the bond may be forfeited to the respondent. The Commission may prescribe the terms and conditions under which bonds may be forfeited under this paragraph."

(f) CONDITIONS APPLICABLE FOR GENERAL EXCLUSION ORDERS.—Section 337(g) of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(3) The authority of the Commission to issue an exclusion from entry of articles shall be limited to persons determined by the Commission to be violating this section unless the Commission determines that—

"(A) a general exclusion from entry of articles is necessary to prevent circumvention of an exclusion from entry limited to such persons; or

"(B) there is a pattern of violation of this section and it is difficult to identify the persons responsible."

(g) ENTRY UNDER BOND AFTER REFERRAL TO PRESIDENT.—Section 337(j)(3) of such Act is amended by striking "shall be entitled to entry under bond" and all that follows through the end period and inserting "shall, until such determination becomes final, be entitled to entry under bond prescribed by the Secretary in an amount determined by the Commission to be sufficient to protect the complainant from injury. A declaration made under this subsection shall have the force and effect of a final determination of the Commission and shall be reviewable as such. In the case of unfair acts involving the validity of patents as described in subsection (a)(1)(B), such a declaration shall be only for the purpose of determining whether there is a violation of this section and shall not have the effect of claim or issue preclusion."

SEC. 4. AMENDMENT OF TITLE 28, UNITED STATES CODE.

"(a) STAY.—In a civil action involving parties that are also parties to a proceeding before the United States International Trade Commission pursuant to section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1337), at the request of a party that is a respondent in the proceeding before the Commission (other than a respondent to a counterclaim in a proceeding for declaratory relief), a district court shall stay, until the determination of the Commission becomes final, proceedings in the civil action with respect to any claim that involves the same issues involved in the proceeding before the Commission.

"(b) USE OF COMMISSION RECORD.—After dissolution of a stay under subsection (a), portions of the record of the proceeding before the United States International Trade Commission that bear on issues in a civil action shall be admissible in the civil action, subject to such protective order as the district court determines necessary and to the extent permitted under the Federal Rules of Evidence and the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure."

(b) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The chapter analysis for chapter 111 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following new item:

"1659. Stay of certain actions pending disposition of related proceedings before the United States International Trade Commission."

SEC. 5. EFFECTIVE DATE.

ITC TRIAL LAWYERS ASSOCIATION,

Washington, DC, July 29, 1992.

Senator JOHN D. (JAY) ROCKEFELLER, IV, SH-109 HART SENATE OFFICE BUILDING, WASHINGTON, DC.

Re Section 337

DEAR SENATOR ROCKEFELLER: Thank you for sharing with our organization your draft legislation for amending Section 337 (19 U.S.C. § 1337). For the following reasons, we believe your approach will well serve the interests of the United States while meeting this country's GATT obligations to our trading partners.

Since the 1974 amendments, in over 330 investigations, Section 337 has proven to be an effective tool for enforcing U.S. intellectual property rights—many times against multiple offenders—in connection with unfair imports into the United States. Over that period, the four most advantageous aspects of these administrative proceedings have been the ability to reach multiple parties in one forum, efficient foreign discovery, expeditious resolution and border enforcement by the U.S. Customs Service. While the GATT ruling in the Aramid Fibers case found fault with Section 337 in four respects, the only one of the foregoing advantages of the statute that might be affected by your proposed legislation is expedition, and it is by no means certain that even this element has to be sacrificed.

While the United States must react to the GATT decision, it should not overreact. It should not change its patent enforcement system. It should not change the focus of Section 337 from an import relief statute to an alternative form of preliminary injunctive relief in connection with imported goods. It should not sacrifice the ability to obtain expeditious relief in the vast majority of cases. It should not trade the flexibility of administrative proceedings for the rigidity of district court rules. What it should do is what your bill proposes—the minimum necessary to preserve the advantages of Section 337 while meeting U.S. international obligations.

Your bill would retain the principal advantages of Section 337 administrative actions while preserving the possibility of preliminary injunctive relief for those cases where such an extraordinary remedy is warranted. Most Section 337 cases, in the future as in the past, will not be driven by the need to obtain temporary exclusion orders. They will remain cases which are brought to the ITC because they involve one or more of the following elements: multiple offenders, a need to obtain effective discovery here and abroad, the desire to obtain relief faster than that which is available from most district courts and the benefit of U.S. Customs Service enforcement of limited or general exclusion orders. Temporary or preliminary relief, along with these advantages, will, nonetheless, continue to be available to those complainants who can pass the same test in the ITC that they would have to meet to obtain a district court preliminary injunction. Alternatively, failing to obtain temporary relief at the ITC, some parties may simply choose to terminate their Section 337 action and pursue their remedies in district court.

Since expedition is the key to Section 337, that is the one element that cannot be sacrificed, as it would be if, for instance, the statute were relegated to the district courts. Under the separation of powers doctrine, neither Congress nor the President would be in a position to dictate to the district courts that import-related patent cases be handled expeditiously, nor should they, when one considers the many competing interest that vie for scheduling advantage in the federal court system. The only hope for maintaining prompt relief in import-related patent cases is to keep Section 337 enforcement exclusively at the ITC where, because of continued Congressional oversight, pressure can be applied if that agency fails to do its job properly. Moreover, unlike the district courts, the ITC, because of its responsibilities in the fields of antidumping and countervailing duties, is very sensitive to the need to protect domestic parties against unfair foreign competition. It does not take too great an act of faith to believe that an agency that is in the vanguard of protecting this country's natural advantages would recognize the need to provide expeditious relief for the protection of intellectual property rights against foreign infringers.

Turning to your bill's proposal to create a new declaratory judgment action before the ITC, the very limited opportunity for and nature of this right is apparent. First of all, the right to bring such an action would not arise unless two conditions are met—there must be a specific threat made of an action to bar importation, and the rights holder must meet the test of a "domestic industry" for the ITC to have jurisdiction to adjudicate the parties' rights. In other words, not every threatened infringement action would give rise to an ITC adjudication, nor could a U.S. patent holder who is engaged in no domestic activity have his patent challenged before the ITC. Finally, because res judicata does not apply, the adjudication of the patent by the ITC will only be for purposes of Section 337, thus giving the threatened party little incentive to choose the ITC over the district court as the forum in which to initiate its action if it is seeking a dispositive determination of patent rights.

As we read your proposal, it would allow respondents to raise directly related counterclaims, not to obtain affirmative relief, but rather to bar the imposition of relief under Section 337. It would appear that, since Section 337 is a trade, not patent statute, a respondent need only be given the opportunity to prevent the imposition of border relief. In fact, the Aramid Fibers case involved a refusal by the ITC to allow respondent to raise as a counterclaim its own process patent in the same field in which it was accused. Had both parties' claims been successful, under your proposed revision to the statute, the ITC would simply have been empowered to deny trade relief to complainant, thus properly relegating the dispute to the district court as a mutual patent infringement action. The narrow ability to raise directly related counterclaims is likely to be of limited value to respondents seeking to thwart, since the facts of the Aramid Fibers situation were the exception, not the rule.

The most troubling aspect of the GATT ruling is the dual forum issue. That question can never be fully solved as long as both a trade remedy and an infringement action lie against imported goods. However, your legislation deals with the underlying inequities raised by the dual forum issue, namely, the expense and inconvenience of two proceedings, whether simultaneous or seriatim. While your proposal eliminates simultaneous proceedings against respondents, it also deals with the cost of multiple actions by preserving as much of the ITC record as possible for use by the parties in district court.

In conclusion, our Association believes that your proposed legislation will serve to solve the long-standing GATT issue regarding Section 337 in a manner that will not only be supported by U.S. industry, but will bring this country into compliance with its international obligations. We would be pleased to provide additional information if that would be of assistance.

Sincerely,

THOMAS V. HEYMAN,
President.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Washington, DC, September 24, 1992.

HON. JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, IV,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR ROCKEFELLER: This letter is to advise you of the views of a representative cross-section of U.S. business on S. 3172, the bill which you introduced on August 11, 1992, to amend Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930. These views were developed by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce Intellectual Property Task Force, a diverse group of 45 member companies which has been considering possible amendments to Section 337 since the U.S. Government unblocked the GATT Panel Report that calls for changes in Section 337.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce Federation of local and state chambers of commerce, businesses, and associations strongly supports Section 337 as a proven and effective remedy against the import of goods by those who seek to benefit unfairly from American inventiveness. On March 23, 1990, the Task Force wrote to the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative in response to a Federal Register Notice request and offered suggestions for amending Section 337. A copy of that letter is attached. The Task Force has reviewed S. 3172 since its introduction and has concluded that the bill substantially accords with the position the Task Force communicated to the Trade Representative.

A major concern by industry is that actions under Section 337 continue to be expeditiously handled, and we are pleased to note that S. 3172 speaks to this issue and calls for the International Trade Commission to establish target dates for completion of its investigations under Section 337. We strongly recommend that the legislative history for S. 3172 emphasize this aspect of the bill and give specific indications of the times that Congress would consider reasonable for the Commission's target dates, which in our view should continue to be the 12-month and 18-month times that are currently required under statute.

In addition, we recommend that any legislation to amend Section 337 include enabling provisions to make the bill effective only upon successful completion of negotiations on Trade Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights (TRIPS) taking place in the Uruguay Round of GATT trade talks. In our view, U.S. interests would be best served by awaiting evidence of responsiveness by our GATT partners as reflected in a successful conclusion to the intellectual property negotiations in the Uruguay Round trade talks.

If you would like additional information or assistance, please contact Wolf Brueckmann at (202) 463-5478.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM T. ARCHY.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, I would like now to turn to the second intellectual property rights protection bill I will introduce today: the International Protection of Patent Rights Act of 1993. It deals with a very different—but certainly no less important—aspect of the problems faced by U.S. companies. This problem is the treatment American companies, especially those in the high-technology area, receive when they apply for patents in foreign countries and, often, even after they obtain patents in these countries.

Along with many Senators, I have been concerned for some time about this issue. My personal attention has focused especially on Japan, but inadequate patent protection is chronic in many countries. To illustrate this problem, I will describe my experience with Japan.

Five years ago, I chaired a hearing in the Foreign Commerce and Tourism Subcommittee in which we looked at the effects of Japan's patent system on American business. Nine months later, I chaired a second hearing on this issue, and I was disappointed to learn that, in the interim, there had been little progress in resolving the problems examined at our first hearing. American and other foreign companies, especially high-technology industries, still faced daunting problems with the Japanese patent system. This was particularly discouraging because there was significant cooperation between the United States and Japan on intellectual property issues in international forums such as the Uruguay round, the World Intellectual Property Organization, and trilateral discussions with the European Patent Office.

At both hearings, specific difficulties were outlined in detail by witnesses representing the U.S. Government, a cross-section of American industry, and academia. The list of problems was long. Let me give several examples.

It took an average of more than 72 months to obtain a patent in Japan, versus 19 months in the United States. The delay in Japan's patent system was an open invitation to copying and abuse. There were many measures Japan could have taken to reduce this delay in its issuance of patents, including greatly increasing the number of patent examiners, altering the system that allows an applicant to defer examination of his patent for up to 7 years, and working with Japanese industry to eliminate the filing of unnecessary applications and applications of limited value which were clogging the patent system.

Patent claims in Japan were interpreted very narrowly, thereby allowing others to make minor changes in the patented invention and avoid liability for infringing the original patent. As a result, patent flooding by Japanese companies continued. This is a practice whereby Japanese companies file large numbers of applications for improvements on an original invention, making it necessary for the owners of the original to cross-license their technology if they want to be able to offer their product in the improved manner.

The Japanese Patent Office permitted the use of foreign language terms in patent applications only in extreme situations. In contrast, the U.S. Patent Office, as well as the European Patent Office, accepts foreign language applications and allows applicants 2 months to submit translations.

This is just a sample of the problems that concerned me 5 years ago. There was a plethora of other areas where improvements were needed to assure that foreign firms were not disadvantaged by the practices permitted by the Japanese patent system. Many of these were listed in an amendment I introduced in July 1988, which was agreed to unanimously by this body. That amendment called on the administration to give this issue higher visibility and to use all possible avenues to persuade the Japanese to correct their patent system.

The United States-Japan Working Group on Intellectual Property was part of our government-to-government trade dialog, part of the administration's effort called for by the Senate amendment. Given the significant trade implications of the issues at hand, I had hoped that the Japanese representatives would be prepared to negotiate seriously. However, little progress on patent issues was made in 1988 and 1989, and I was very disappointed by this lack of results. Japanese Government officials failed to recognize the critically important trade ramifications of these patent problems.

Well, Mr. President, since 1989 the patent process in Japan really hasn't changed much. The Japan Patent Office hires a few more patent examiners each year—they now have some 900 examiners—but with hundreds of thousands of applications per year, the backlog is actually growing. For example, in 1988, the Japan Patent Office received 339,399 applications—308,908 Japanese applicants—but registered only 55,300 patents; in 1989 it received 351,207 applications—317,566 from Japanese applicants—but registered only 63,301 patents, and in 1990, the last full year for which I have data, the Japan Patent Office received 367,590 applications—333,230 from Japanese applicants—but issued only 59,401 patents.

The Japan Patent Office's delay in granting patents, or even examining the applications after they are filed, is almost as bad as it was in 1989. It still takes about 3 years before an application even gets picked up for examination. Then, once an examiner picks up an application, the average time to the granting of a patent, according to statistics from the Japanese Government, is another 32 months; that is, if there is no opposition. However, as the Japan Patent Office continues to make applications subject to pre-grant opposition, the process is in many cases even slower. Overall, this is only a 4-month reduction from the 72-month average pendency that existed 4 years ago. Some U.S. firms have experienced delays for up to 10 years, or even longer, from the filing date to the grant of the patent.

Furthermore, the term of a patent granted in Japan still runs from the filing date, a practice which, because of the long delays in examination and processing, limits the value of a patent. For example, without an issued patent, a company will have a difficult or impossible time negotiating licensing fees, something important for manufacturers of pharmaceuticals and microelectronics. For the electronics industry, the situation is especially bad: The delay in examination and processing is often longer than the average life of the products. The majority of sales by many U.S. high-technology companies is based on products that didn't exist 6 years, or even 3 years earlier. By the time the Japan Patent Office begins its examination, or by the time a patent is granted in Japan, the product may no longer have a commercial value.

Great uncertainty for these companies also exists when a competitor has filed a patent application for a similar product or process. The U.S. company may get hit with an infringement lawsuit years later, after it no longer sells the product. Or, vice versa, the U.S. company may not be able to file an infringement suit until the product involved is no longer being sold, and the damage has already been done. Neither company will know for certain whether it is in the right or the wrong. With this type of uncertainty, further technological development is stymied.

One of the major causes of the Japan Patent Office's huge backlog is the unnecessarily narrow interpretations of patent claims it allows. Because of this, Japanese companies still have hundreds of patent engineers cranking out patents that clog the system. Under this system, if United States companies don't have patent engineers and lawyers in Japan—a luxury small United States companies cannot afford—they find it extremely difficult to compete.

Mr. President, I believe it is time to renew legislative efforts in this area. The problems we examined in 1988 and 1989 continue to afflict U.S. companies. Another example of this situation was brought to my attention just last year. It concerns a small, American company that has developed a truly innovative technology which promises to provide many American jobs, American exports, and American profits. This case also concerns the threat that this technology will be stolen by a large Japanese conglomerate because of the lack of effective intellectual property rights protection by the Japanese patent system.

The American company is Noise Cancellation Technologies, Inc. [NCT] of Linthicum, MD. NCT controls the basic technology that cancels unwanted noise through the application of active counternoise through its trade secrets, proprietary computer software codes, and, most important, its patents. It owns dozens of patents, except in Japan, and has other patent applications pending worldwide.

In Japan, the Patent Office has refused to recognize a key patent that has been granted to NCT in the United States and every other foreign country where NCT has filed a patent application. I repeat: NCT's innovative technology has been patented in every foreign country where NCT has filed a patent application except Japan. As a result, at least one very large Japanese automobile company has announced plans to market cars with an active noise cancellation system in the passenger compartment. Although a recent patent validity and infringement legal opinion found that this system infringes three of the patents owned by NCT, the Japanese company has made no arrangements to pay for its use of NCT patents. Current U.S. law gives NCT no protection from sales of these products outside the United States and would provide NCT recourse in the United States only after the infringing imports have come into the U.S. market. This is a predicament that United States inventors have repeatedly faced because of the vagaries of the Japanese and other foreign patent systems.

Why is this an important issue? Just a brief description of what this one new, U.S.-developed technology does—and what it could mean in terms of U.S. jobs, production, exports, and profits—will show how important it can be to American workers, manufacturers, and consumers. Applications of NCT's patented noise cancellation technology include: Selective headsets for the military and workplaces that eliminate noise but let you hear what you want; similar, but much larger systems for vehicle and aircraft passenger compartments; quiet mufflers for all types of internal combustion engines, for automobiles, trucks, industrial machinery, construction equipment, et cetera; quieting enclosures for pumps and compressors; elimination of in-wire noise signals in communications equipment; many military applications where noise stealth is important, and many others.

One needs only to think of situations where noise is a problem to imagine what other applications and their benefits could be. Each one of these applications will spawn spinoff products and industries that could employ hundreds of thousands of workers in the United States if the technology is not stolen by other countries.

Some of the benefits are less obvious. For example, it has been found that substituting NCT's new muffler for the existing types can increase the vehicle's gas mileage by 3 to 7 percent. This means a potential national savings of billions of dollars annually to individual Americans, a similar reduction in our dependence on foreign oil supplies, and an improvement in our environment.

It is because of this case and many other similar ones that Senator MIKULSKI, Senator HATCH, Senator WOFFORD, and I are introducing today the International Protection of Patent Rights Act of 1993. With standards for adequate and effective foreign patent protection for U.S. companies the legislation we are proposing will use the Special 301 provisions of the trade law to require USTR first to determine which countries do not provide adequate patent protection and then to negotiate a satisfactory solution. With the Special 301 specific mandates and strict time-tables, this legislation can, I believe, help eliminate the type of problem I've just described. I hope all of my colleagues will support this effort.

This bill we introduce today is not another "shot across the bow" of Japan and other countries. The time for warnings and patience has passed. With the support of this body and of the House of Representatives, which passed a similar measure last year, we can take action now. I urge the Senate to take expeditious action on this proposal as well.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the proposed International Protection of Patent Rights Act of 1993 be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 149

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "International Protection of Patent Rights Act of 1993".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSE.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) Several countries (including Brazil, India, Indonesia, Japan, Korea, Pakistan, Taiwan, and Thailand) maintain patent systems that effectively deny adequate and effective patent protection to United States nationals because of—

(A) unreasonable delays in granting or enforcing patents,

(B) pre-grant opposition to patent applications,

(C) unnecessarily narrow interpretations of patent claims by the authorities which determine patent validity and infringement, and

(D) other policies and practices.

(2) The lack of adequate and effective patent protection in these countries denies fair and equitable market access to United States nationals that rely upon intellectual property rights protection.

(b) PURPOSE.—The purpose of this Act is to amend the Trade Act of 1974 to respond to the actions of countries that do not provide adequate and effective patent protection to United States nationals.

SEC. 3. IDENTIFICATION OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Section 182 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2242) is amended—

(1) in subsection (a)(1)—

(A) by striking "or" at the end of subparagraph (A),

(B) by striking "and" at the end of subparagraph (B) and inserting "or", and

(C) by inserting after subparagraph (B) the following new subparagraph:

"(C) deny adequate substantive standards, and";

(2) in subsection (b)(1)(A)—

(A) by striking "or" at the end of clause (i),

(B) by inserting "or" at the end of clause (ii), and

(C) by inserting after clause (ii) the following new clause:

(iii) deny adequate substantive standards,";

(3) by adding at the end of subsection (d), the following new paragraph:

"(4) A foreign country denies adequate substantive standards if the country enforces or permits procedures under its patent approval system that result in, among other practices—

"(A) patent applications being subject to pre-grant opposition,

"(B) extended deferral (beyond 3 years) of patent examination,

"(C) an inordinately long period of time for patent application approval,

"(D) an inordinately short patent term measured either from the date of grant or from the date of filing,

"(E) an inordinate delay in obtaining judicial review or unavailability of judicial review for patent applications that are denied, or

"(F) unnecessarily narrow interpretations of patent claims by the authorities which determine patent validity and infringement.";

(4) by adding at the end of subsection (e) the following new sentence: "Such publication shall include information with respect to any act, policy, or practice identified under subsection (a) and information with respect to any action taken (or the reasons for not taking action) to eliminate such act, policy, or practice."•

• Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. President, it is important for the United States to stand up and support the rights of our inventors and businesses. A big part of this responsibility is protecting our intellectual property. America protects the rights of innovators because we know that encouraging these entrepreneurs is the best way to create the jobs and the technology that keep our country competitive.

We do a pretty good job of protecting intellectual property rights in our own country, but we haven't done enough to stand up to other nations that allow patented inventions, copyrights, and other products to be stolen. This theft costs our companies billions of dollars and thousands of jobs every year, and it hits our high technology industries the hardest.

That's why I am joining Senator ROCKEFELLER, Senator HATCH, and Senator WOFFORD in introducing the Intellectual Protection of Patent Rights Act. This bill is designed to protect American companies who invest their resources and their employees' skills to develop a new product, and to make sure that such a great investment isn't lost to foreigners that cherry pick American inventions.

Unfortunately, this has been a very serious problem for Maryland companies trying to do business in Japan. Three years ago, when I first joined with Senator ROCKEFELLER to work on this issue, Fusion Systems of Rockville, MD, was coming under siege in Japan as they tried to protect their patents and their products. It became clearer to many Senators that the Japanese patent law system is problematic and threatens American businesses.

And now, just recently, another Maryland company is having very similar problems with patents in Japan. This company is facing possible theft of its inventions by a big Japanese corporation. Unfortunately, it seems the Japanese patent system is still stacked against this and other innovative American businesses.

This Maryland company can't get Japan to issue a patent they need, even though that same patent has been granted by every other country where they applied. Even though the company has made it clear that a Japanese company is already infringing on their patents, by the time they get any recourse under Japanese law, the United States market could be flooded with infringing products.

Unfortunately, the problems this Maryland company is facing aren't unusual in Japan. This is part of the way the Japanese patent system works.

That's why our Government has to work on behalf of American businesses to get Japan to change that system. Senator ROCKEFELLER and I introduce our bill to get Japan and other nations to treat American companies fairly when it comes to patents, and we will keep up our fight.

Our bill requires the U.S. Trade Representative to use Special 301 provisions in American trade law to target countries that are the worst violators of international patent protection laws. Then, USTR will have to negotiate a solution to these countries' lack of patent protections in a specified time frame, or those countries will face retaliation.

We hope that this bill will get the rest of the world to understand the value that America places on rewarding innovation, and let them know we are serious about standing up for the rights of our businesses and our workers.•

By Mr. KOHL:

S. 150. A bill to provide for assistance in the preservation of Taliesin in the State of Wisconsin, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

TALIESIN PRESERVATION ACT OF 1993

• Mr. KOHL. Mr. President, last year we celebrated the 125th anniversary of Frank Lloyd Wright's birth. At that time, I was pleased to observe this occasion by introducing legislation to ensure for future generations the continued existence of the embodiment of this great American artist's legacy, Taliesin in Spring Green, WI. I rise today to reintroduce the Taliesin Preservation Act of 1993. I am pleased that Congressman SCOTT KLUG will once again be introducing the companion legislation in the House of Representatives.

Two years ago I had the pleasure of making my first visit to Taliesin, which is Welsh for "shining brow," the national historic landmark complex which includes Mr. Wright's home, architectural school, and studio. Everything, from the pattern of the driveways and rolling lines of the fields to the lighting, furnishings, and collected objects inside, is an outstanding product of Mr. Wright's genius, incorporating his sensitive and innovative response to environment and changing technologies.

Frank Lloyd Wright's influence on architecture in this century will surely go on into future centuries, not only because the forms themselves are so timeless, but because his ideas remain so vibrant. However, it was clearly demonstrated during my visit that after 81 years, Taliesin is definitely showing signs of physical deterioration. In response to the need for restoration and preservation, the Taliesin Preservation Commission has been created to develop and implement programs to preserve Taliesin and provide an environment where an international audience can learn more about the work, ideas, and accomplishments of Frank Lloyd Wright. Substantial financial commitments have been made by the State of Wisconsin and through the commission's ongoing private fundraising efforts to undertake and complete this comprehensive plan.

The legislation I am reintroducing today will provide, on a matching basis, the additional technical and financial assistance required for Taliesin's restoration, preservation, and protection. It will assure that this legacy of Frank Lloyd Wright will be preserved for the continuing public benefit of visitors and scholars from around the world, while ensuring the continuation of the private ownership and management of this preeminent site. I believe these dual goals can be best achieved through designation and recognition of Taliesin as an affiliated area of the National Park Service.

On December 18, 1992, the Wisconsin Housing and Economic Development Authority adopted a resolution expressing the intent to develop a financing arrangement to raise $8 million to assist in the preservation of Taliesin, through the issuance of business development revenue bonds. I believe this to be a significant development, because the bill that I am introducing today would require matching funds from State and private sources in order to secure the Federal funding assistance authorized in the legislation.

Mr. President, Frank Lloyd Wright was truly an American artist. Examples of his legacy can be seen throughout the Nation. Citizens of Wisconsin, Illinois, Michigan, New York, New Hampshire, Virginia, Iowa, California, Pennsylvania, Florida, Arizona, Oklahoma, and Alabama can boast of publicly accessible buildings within their States which were designed by Frank Lloyd Wright. I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsorship of this legislation to aid in the preservation of Taliesin, the Nation's preeminent example of the work of this exceptional American artist.

I request unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 151. A bill to amend title XIX of the Social Security Act to permit payments under a State plan to certain vaccine manufacturers; to the Committee on Finance.

SOCIAL SECURITY ACT VACCINE AMENDMENTS OF 1993

● Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce legislation that will make vaccines more available to low-income preschool children. I am appalled by the low immunization rates in this country. According to a recent Children's Defense Fund report, fewer than 60 percent of 2-year-olds are fully immunized. In my State, in 1992, only 44 percent of 2-year-olds were immunized.

Access to health care is one of the reasons children are not being immunized. This legislation will increase access to immunizations by encouraging private physicians to immunize Medicaid children in their offices rather than referring them to overcrowded public clinics. According to the Children's Defense Fund, 84 percent of pediatricians and 66 percent of family practitioners reported referring at least some of their patients to public clinics for immunizations. The primary reason for the high number of referrals is that many physicians find that it is not financially feasible for them to immunize Medicaid patients. Physicians must use the vaccine purchased from a pharmaceutical company, only to have the State slowly reimburse them at a fraction of the cost.

The legislation will remove the disincentive by making it easier for States and drug companies to establish a vaccine replacement program. Under this replacement program, physicians that immunize Medicaid children will be given replacement vaccines rather than inadequate reimbursements. The State Medicaid offices will pay the pharmaceutical company directly for the vaccines at substantially reduced rates. This is a cost saving program for States to the extent that the cost paid to the pharmaceutical companies for the vaccines is much less than the reimbursements.

The Commonwealth of Virginia was successful in getting a waiver of the Social Security Act to implement a replacement program. This was an onerous process. This legislation will make it easier for vaccine manufacturers to enter into voluntary replacement programs with State Medicaid agencies. It will increase access to vaccines while also alleviating some of the costs to Medicaid. The director of Virginia's Department of Medical Assistance Services believes that in addition to encouraging more physicians to participate in the replacement program it will also save the State about $800,000 annually.

Preventive care is of paramount importance to all children in our Nation. It is inexcusable to allow children to suffer and sometimes die from diseases that can be prevented by a vaccine. Of course, this legislation does not provide universal vaccines to all children, only to the neediest. Perhaps we need legislation of this sort in the near future. It is essential that we use every opportunity to immunize our children.●

Mr. PRESSLER:

S. 152. A bill to amend the Mount Rushmore Commemorative Coin Act to conform to the intent of Congress; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

MOUNT RUSHMORE COMMEMORATIVE COIN ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1993

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, today I am introducing corrective legislation to amend the Mount Rushmore Commemorative Coin Act, which Congress enacted in 1990. The purpose of my legislation is to fulfill the congressional intent of the 1990 act. Specifically, this measure will provide needed funding to continue the vital renovation currently underway at the Mount Rushmore National Memorial. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this effort.

Mount Rushmore attracts more than 2 million visitors each year. It truly is America's Shrine of Democracy. The memorial improvements project is important not only to South Dakotans, but all Americans, young and old. We must ensure Mount Rushmore's preservation today for tomorrow's children to enjoy.

Mr. President, a brief legislative history will assist my colleagues in understanding my intent for introducing this technical amendment. The Mount Rushmore Commemorative Coin Act provided for the minting of 1991 commemorative coins in recognition of the Mount Rushmore Memorial's golden anniversary. Of the total surcharges received, 50 percent was to be promptly paid to the Mount Rushmore Society for the improvement and preservation project at the memorial. The remaining funds would go to the Treasury for reducing our national debt.

Because the preservation project was already underway, prompt payment of the surcharges to the society was imperative. To accomplish this goal, the Senate passed a measure I introduced during the last Congress making a technical change to the timing of the surcharge distribution.

I introduced technical corrective legislation in January 1991, long before the sale of the coins ended in December 1991. At that time, it was anticipated the surcharges would total up to $37.5 million, and the society would receive up to $18.75 million for the preservation project. Disappointingly, the total surcharges realized was only approximately $12 million.

The Mount Rushmore Society sought to finance the Mount Rushmore renovations project mostly through private contributions. However, proceeds from the coin sales were an essential funding source. Far short from the society's coin funding goal, the preservation project faces a funding crisis.

Mr. President, the measure I am introducing today is identical to the bill passed by the Senate during the 102d Congress. Through the House of Representatives failed to act on my legislation, it accepted a similar provision as part of the urban aid bill. Yet, as my colleagues know, the urban aid bill was not signed into law.

The actions taken during the 102d Congress is compelling evidence of strong congressional support for the preservation effort underway at Mount Rushmore. Therefore, I am hopeful that the 103d Congress will act expeditiously to approve my legislation. If enacted, the Treasury will be directed to provide up to the first $18.75 million in surcharges to the Mount Rushmore Society.

Mr. President, April 13, 1993 will mark the 250th anniversary of the birth of Thomas Jefferson, one of four Presidents who were immortalized on Mount Rushmore as timeless monuments to our Nation's freedom and democracy. With timely passage of this legislation, we can ensure the preservation of America's Shrine of Democracy as we pay tribute to Democracy's most eloquent advocate.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 152

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. DISTRIBUTION OF SURCHARGES.

Section 8 of the Mount Rushmore Commemorative Coin Act (31 U.S.C. 5112 note) is amended by striking paragraphs (1) and (2) and inserting the following:

"(1) the first $18,750,000 shall be promptly paid by the Secretary to the Society to assist the Society's efforts to improve, enlarge, and renovate the Mount Rushmore National Memorial; and

"(2) the remainder shall be returned to the United States Treasury for purposes of reducing the national debt."

SEC. 2. RETROACTIVE EFFECT.

The amendments made by section 1 shall be deemed to have the same effective date as the Mount Rushmore Commemorative Coin Act. Any surcharges paid into the United States Treasury prior to the date of enactment of this Act in connection with the issuance of coins under the Mount Rushmore Commemorative Coin Act (which amounts have not been otherwise obligated) shall be redistributed by the Secretary of the Treasury in accordance with the amendments made by section 1.

By Mr. THURMOND:

S. 153. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to provide that service performed for an elementary or secondary school operated primarily for religious purposes is exempt from the Federal unemployment tax; to the Committee on Finance.

INTERNAL REVENUE CODE OF 1986 SCHOOL AMENDMENT ACT OF 1993

• Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation which would remove an inequity in the current Federal Unemployment Tax Act [FUTA] and in the State unemployment acts which are directly patterned after this act.

In enacting FUTA, Congress exempted from coverage employees of churches, and religious organizations operated by churches. The Supreme Court in St. Martin Evangelical Lutheran Church versus South Dakota held that this exemption extends to schools which are operated by churches.

However, no exemption exists in current law for those elementary or secondary schools which are operated primarily for religious purposes, but which are not operated by or otherwise controlled by a church or association of churches. These nonchurch schools are as pervasively religious as the church-operated schools and would not exist except for their religious mission. They are, in every way except church affiliation, religiously indistinguishable from the exempt schools. Technically, the nonchurch religious schools are not exempt under the terms of the statute.

These non-church-affiliated religious schools are not numerous in the United States. However, they do constitute about 20% of the membership of the Protestant evangelical schools in the country. There are some Catholic and Jewish schools, as well as other Protestant schools, which are not operated by churches but are governed by religious lay boards.

The tax plight of these schools is very threatening to them. In 1979, a group of religious schools attempted to litigate the issue of nonexemption of these schools on constitutional grounds, and won a favorable decision from the U.S. District Court in Los Angeles. The Supreme Court refused to review the case on jurisdictional grounds and did not reach the merits. This left the schools to pursue litigation in State courts. These schools simply do not have the major financial resources necessary to pursue new litigation in hopes of eventually bringing the case before the Supreme Court. Such litigation could take years, with no certainty that the Supreme Court would hear the case. Therefore, it is imperative that we pass exemptive legislation.

This measure is similar to S. 67 which I introduced in the 102d Congress and is identical to an amendment which was unanimously adopted by the Senate during consideration of the tax technical corrections bill in 1988. Unfortunately, this provision was dropped in conference. I reintroduced this measure in the 102d and 101st Congress; however, no action was taken.

This legislation will enable non-church-operated religious schools, now threatened by unemployment compensation tax debt, to continue their fine service to the country in producing good young citizens. Passage of this bill will be welcomed by friends of religious liberty.

In closing, I ask my colleagues to give careful consideration to this important measure. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the legislation appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD immediately following my remarks.

SECTION 1. EXEMPTION FROM UNEMPLOYMENT TAX.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 3309(b)(1) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (relating to exemption from unemployment tax) is amended by inserting before the semicolon at the end thereof the following: ", or (C) an elementary or secondary school which is operated primarily for religious purposes, which is described in section 501(c)(3), and which is exempt from tax under section 501(a)".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to services performed after December 31, 1992. •

S. 155. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 with respect to the treatment of certain amounts received by a cooperative telephone company; to the Committee on Finance.

TELEPHONE COOPERATIVES ACT OF 1993

• Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, I rise to introduce legislation that reaffirms the intent of the U.S. Congress, originally expressed in 1916, to grant tax exempt status to telephone cooperatives. This exemption is now set forth in section 501(c)(12) of the Internal Revenue Code.

I introduced a similar measure in the 102d Congress. That bill was included with minor changes in H.R. 11, the Revenue Act of 1992, which was passed by Congress but vetoed by President Bush. The version I introduce today is identical to the provision that was contained in H.R. 11 last year.

Congress has always understood that tax exemption is necessary to ensure that reliable, universal telephone service is available in rural America at a cost that is affordable to the rural consumer. Telephone cooperatives are nonprofit entities that provide this service where it might otherwise not exist due to the high cost of reaching remote, sparsely populated areas.

The facilities of a telephone cooperative are used to provide both local and long distance communications services. Perhaps the most important of these for rural users is long distance. Without these services, both local and long distance, people in rural areas could not communicate with the world, much less with their own neighbors. While telephone cooperatives comprise only a small fraction of the U.S. telephone industry—about 1 percent—their services are vitally important to those who must rely upon them.

Under Internal Revenue Code section 501(c)(12), a telephone cooperative qualifies for tax exemption only if at least 85 percent of its gross income consists of "amounts collected from members for the sole purpose of meeting losses and expenses." Thus, the bulk of the revenues must be related to providing services needed by members of the cooperative, that is, rural consumers. No more than 15 percent of the cooperative's gross income may come from nonmember sources, such as property rentals or interest earned on funds on deposit in a bank. For purposes of the 85 percent test, certain categories of income are deemed neither member nor non-member income and are excluded from the calculation. The reason for the 85 percent test is to ensure that cooperatives do not abuse their tax exempt status.

A technical advice memorandum or TAM released by the Internal Revenue Service has threatened to change the way telephone cooperatives characterize certain expenses for purposes of the 85 percent test. If the rationale set forth in the TAM is applied to all telephone cooperatives, the majority will lose their tax exempt status.

Specifically, the IRS now appears to take the position that all fees received by telephone cooperatives from long distance companies for use of the local lines must be excluded from the 85 percent test and that fees received for billing and collection services performed by cooperatives on behalf of long distance companies constitute nonmember income to the cooperative.

The legislation I am introducing today would clarify that access revenues paid by long distance companies to telephone cooperatives are to be counted as member revenues, so long as they are related to long distance calls paid for by members of the cooperative. In addition, the legislation would indicate that billing and collection fees are to be excluded entirely from the 85 percent test calculation.

Mr. President, it is no secret that mere distance is the single most important obstacle to rural development. In the telecommunications industry today, we have the ability to bridge distances better than ever before. Technology in this area has advanced at an incredible pace. But, maintaining and upgrading the rural telecommunications infrastructure is an exceedingly expensive proposition, and we must do all we can to encourage this development.

Ensuring that telephone cooperatives may retain their legitimate tax exempt status is one vital step we can take. I believe that providing access to customers for long distance calls and billing and collecting for those calls on behalf of the cooperative's members and the long distance companies are indisputably part of the exempt function of providing telephone service, especially to rural communities. The nature and function of telephone cooperatives have not materially changed since 1916 and neither should the formula upon which they rely to obtain tax exempt status.

At this time, Mr. President, I ask that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD in its entirety at the close of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. DASCHLE:

S. 156. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to allow the energy investment credit for solar energy and geothermal property against the entire regular tax and the alternative minimum tax; to the Committee on Finance.

ENERGY CREDITS ACT OF 1993

• Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, a successful national energy policy requires that we shift our reliance away from finite fossil fuels toward the infinite supply of renewable alternative technologies.

To that end, in the 102d Congress I introduced legislation that would have extended for 5 years the business energy tax credits set forth in section 46 of the Internal Revenue Code for investments in solar and geothermal energy facilities. At the time, those credits were scheduled to expire at the end of 1992. In addition, I introduced a bill that would have allowed the credits to be taken against the alternative minimum tax or AMT for those businesses subject to its provisions.

After much hard work, a provision making the solar and geothermal energy tax credits permanent was incorporated into the Energy Policy Act enacted into law last year. The proposal to allow the credits against the AMT, however, was not included in that legislation. Therefore, today I am reintroducing the bill that would permit the businesses subject to the AMT to take advantage of the credits for investment in solar and geothermal energy facilities. These energy credits represent a small but important contribution to developing a broader, more sensible, and more reliable national energy strategy. We must ensure that the policy behind promoting development of these renewable energy sources is not thwarted by other provisions in the tax code.

The promotion of renewable energy sources is more important now than ever before. If recent events in the Persian Gulf have demonstrated anything, it is that we cannot continue to ignore our increasing dependence on imported oil. The world's oil supply is going to run out. Nothing can change that. However, to the extent that we foster and encourage the development of solar and geothermal technologies, we can reduce our reliance on imported oil.

Moreover, the need to slow the detrimental effects on our environment of traditional sources of energy is as important as energy supply and security. Renewable energy sources are the answer to this need. I have often spoken on the merits of alcohol fuels in this regard. Solar and geothermal energy have similar potential for the environment. For example, in the solar mode of operation, solar technology has no combustion-related emissions at all. Even when using backup fossil fuel to assure reliability, present generation solar technology produces far less carbon dioxide than natural gas, the cleanest fossil fuel alternative. Geothermal plants also emit substantially less carbon dioxide than gas, oil, or coal-fired plants for the same electrical output.

Recent investment in solar and geothermal technologies is just beginning to yield potential return in the form of energy security and an improved environment. These technologies are not yet at the point, however, where they are commercially viable. The tax credits provide the margin needed to keep renewable projects in operation. It would be counterproductive not to extend the credits to those businesses falling under the AMT, in view of our national investment to date and our desire to lessen our dependence on imported oil.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in its entirety in the RECORD following my statement.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION 1. CHANGES RELATING TO ENERGY CREDIT.

(a) ENERGY CREDIT ALLOWABLE AGAINST ENTIRE REGULAR TAX AND ALTERNATIVE MINIMUM TAX.—

(1) Subsection (c) of section 38 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (relating to limitation based on amount of tax) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

“(3) SPECIAL RULES FOR ENERGY CREDIT.—

“(A) IN GENERAL.—In the case of a C corporation, this section and section 39 shall be applied separately—

“(i) first with respect to so much of the credit allowed by subsection (a) as is not attributable to the energy credit, and “(ii) then with respect to the energy credit.

“(B) RULES FOR APPLICATION OF ENERGY CREDIT.—

“(i) IN GENERAL.—In the case of the energy credit, in lieu of applying the preceding paragraphs of this subsection, the amount of such credit allowed under subsection (a) for any taxable year shall not exceed the net chapter 1 tax for such year.

“(ii) NET CHAPTER 1 TAX.—For purposes of clause (i), the term ‘net chapter 1 tax’ means the sum of the regular tax liability for the taxable year and the tax imposed by section 55 for the taxable year, reduced by the sum of the credits allowable under this part for the taxable year (other than under section 34 and other than the energy credit).

“(C) ENERGY CREDIT.—For purposes of this paragraph, the term ‘energy credit’ means the credit allowable under subsection (a) by reason of section 48(a).”

(2) Paragraph (2) of section 55(c) of such Code is amended to read as follows:

“(2) CROSS REFERENCES.—

“(A) For provisions providing that certain credits are not allowable against the tax imposed by this section, see sections 26(a), 28(d)(2), 29(b)(5), and 38(c).

“(B) For provision allowing energy credit against the tax imposed by this section, see section 38(c)(3).”

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1992.●

By Mr. DASCHLE:

S. 157. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to increase the standard mileage rate deduction for charitable use of passenger automobiles; to the Committee on Finance.

INTERNAL REVENUE CODE OF 1986 AMENDMENT
ACT OF 1993

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, I rise to introduce legislation that addresses a small, but important, concern regarding the deduction of mileage expenses by individuals who volunteer their services to help carry out the activities of charitable organizations.

Many individuals who volunteer for charitable organizations incur out-of-pocket expenses that are not reimbursed by the charity. One such expense occurs where an individual uses his or her own car to carry out charitable purpose activities. Examples of this are when an individual provides transportation to a hospital for veterans, delivers meals to the homeless or elderly on behalf of a charity, or transports children to Scouting and other youth activities.

In 1984, Congress set a standard mileage expense deduction rate of 12 cents per mile for individuals who use their vehicles to carry out the tax-exempt goals of charitable organizations. The express purpose of the deduction was to support the efforts of volunteers, who do not receive any charitable deduction for the value of their contributed services, and to take into account the additional out-of-pocket costs of operation of a vehicle in doing so.

At the time that Congress codified the standard charitable mileage deduction at 12 cents per mile, the standard deduction for mileage expenses incurred in connection with one's trade or business was 20.5 cents for the first 15,000 miles and 11 cents per mile thereafter. Since that time, the U.S. Department of the Treasury, through the Internal Revenue Service, has increased the standard mileage rate for business travel expenses to 28 cents per mile for unlimited mileage.

Unfortunately, due to an anomaly in the Tax Code, the Secretary of the Treasury does not have the authority to make corresponding increases in the standard mileage rate for charitable use of one's vehicle. Thus, the standard charitable mileage rate remains at 12 cents per mile today.

The legislation I am introducing addresses this inconsistency in two ways. First, it would increase the standard charitable mileage expense deduction rate to 16 cents per mile. This would restore the ratio that existed in 1984 between the charitable mileage rate and the business mileage rate.

Second, the legislation would give the Secretary of the Treasury the authority to make subsequent increases in the charitable mileage rate without further permission from Congress, just as it currently does with the mileage rate for business use of a vehicle. The intent of this provision of the legislation is to insure that, as increases are made in the future to the standard business mileage rate, the charitable mileage deduction will be increased, as well, so as to maintain the ratio that existed between these two mileage rates in 1984.

Mr. President, many charitable organizations today are being forced to take on a greater burden than ever before, due to cutbacks over the past 12 years in Federal programs for veterans, the elderly, and other groups in need. As a result, these organizations must increasingly rely on volunteer assistance to provide the services that are central to their tax exempt purposes. If we can do no more, at the very least we in Congress should ensure that helpful measures remaining in the law are not allowed to erode.

On behalf of volunteers of every stripe, I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. DASCHLE:

S. 158. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to allow a deduction for travel expenses of certain loggers; to the Committee on Finance.

TRAVEL EXPENSE DEDUCTION ACT OF 1993

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today in my continuing effort to address what I feel is an unfair ruling by the Internal Revenue Service that severely affects a certain segment of American workers. It is a situation where pure tax policy simply is not practical in its application to everyday life.

In my State of South Dakota, there is a national forest called the Black Hills Forest. It is a very large forest of some 6,000 square miles. Many of my colleagues may be familiar with it.

In this forest, there is a thriving logging industry that employs many South Dakotans. The logging companies that have operations there would not be able to do their business without the assistance of those who cut the logs in the first instance and haul or skid them to the trucks that carry the logs to the mill. These cutters and skidders, and the contractors who employ them, are usually referred to simply as loggers.

For a logger, traveling to work every day is very different from the experience of the average commuter. Loggers often travel as much as a couple of hours one way to the site where cutting is taking place. This may involve driving along miles of unpaved forest roads. It isn't possible for them to live closer to their worksite, not only because of its location, but also because that site may change from month to month. In addition, loggers must have vehicles that are capable of traversing rough forest terrain.

Despite the number of miles the loggers must travel to work each day and the rough terrain, the IRS has said that their expenses of traveling from home to the worksite and back again are nondeductible commuting expenses. This is true regardless of the location of the worksite within the forest and its distance from the individual logger's home. For, according to the IRS, the entire 6,000-square-mile forest is the loggers' tax home or regular place of business for purposes of deducting mileage expenses.

Despite the IRS's reasons for taking this position, the effect of the rule on loggers in the Black Hills is unfair. It imposes a hardship on them and fails to recognize the special circumstances of their jobs. True, other taxpayers are not permitted to deduct commuting mileage expenses. But other taxpayers generally are not forced to travel such long distances to and from work each day or to drive along dirt forest roads.

To rectify this situation, I introduced legislation in the 102d Congress that would have allowed loggers, in the Black Hills or elsewhere, to deduct their mileage expenses incurred while traveling between their homes and the cutting site, so long as the mileage is legitimately related to their business. Although the measure was not included in tax legislation last year primarily due to revenue concerns, a provision requiring the U.S. Department of the Treasury to study the issue was passed in H.R. 11, the Revenue Act of 1992. Unfortunately, that legislation was subsequently vetoed by President Bush.

Today I am reintroducing the bill that I introduced in the 102d allowing loggers to deduct their mileage expenses incurred while traveling between their homes and the cutting site. I urge my colleagues, particularly those who have loggers in their State, to take a close look at it. This may seem a small matter in the scheme of what we do here in the Senate, but it would restore a measure of fairness to loggers who currently are subject to the IRS's whims.

Mr. President, I ask that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 159. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to repeal the luxury excise tax; to the Committee on Finance.

LUXURY EXCISE TAX REPEAL ACT OF 1993

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation repealing the luxury excise tax.

I originally introduced this legislation in 1991—we've been plagued by the tax since 1990. This is not a luxury tax on the rich, it is a tax on middle America. It is a tax on the many Americans who have lost their jobs—working people like mechanics, boat builders, parts managers. It is a tax on the many businesses that have been shut down.

Kansas is America's headquarters for aircraft manufacturers. According to the General Aviation Manufacturers Association, the total number of aircraft sold in 1989, 1,535, has dropped to 899 in 1992.

But, it's not just the aircraft manufacturers. The luxury tax continues to hurt the sales of cars priced over $30,000. In the boating industry, the National Marine Manufacturers Association reports one-third of America's boat building companies have closed their doors; over 20,000 jobs have been lost. While we may have seen a boost in retail sales over the recent Christmas holidays the damaging impact of the luxury tax is obvious to jewelers and furriers. A recent economic study shows that at least 25,000 jobs were lost in the jewelry industry since 1990. There continues to be high unemployment in the industry and companies continue to go bankrupt.

In the last go-around, the Ways and Means Committee Democrats proposed repealing luxury taxes on all products except automobiles. The tax is unfair, but it is fundamentally unfair to subject one industry to the tax.

Let's not waste any more time on this issue. Many Americans remain out of work. I urge my colleagues to join me in repealing this worker penalty.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 160. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to promote investment in small businesses by providing Federal tax relief and simplification for such businesses and their investors; to the Committee on Finance.

SMALL BUSINESS INVESTMENT ACT OF 1993

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am joined today by the distinguished ranking members of the Finance Committee and the Small Business Committee, Senators PACKWOOD and PRESSLER, and other Republicans to introduce the Small Business Investment Act of 1993.

Small businesses are the foundation of our country's economy. We must protect, strengthen, and promote the innovation and growth of our small businesses. It is their contribution to the economy which will help direct our country's prosperity.

This proposal, the Small Business Investment Act of 1993 is a start. It is aimed at reducing capital costs and administrative complexity.

INCREASE CURRENT DEDUCTION FOR CERTAIN INVESTMENTS FROM $10,000 TO $25,000

Small businesses often have trouble raising the capital to make their business a success. Under current law, business owners are allowed to deduct the first $10,000 they invest in equipment for their businesses. By increasing the expensing of equipment from $10,000 to $25,000, we reduce the cost of capital and increase cash flow, thereby providing an incentive to increase investment. Expensing also allows small businesses to avoid the headaches and the costs associated with maintaining depreciation schedules.

ALLOW IMMEDIATE EXPENSING OF NEW BUSINESS STARTUP COSTS

There are many disincentives in starting up new businesses. This bill would encourage startup activities by lowering the after tax cost of starting up a small business. The immediate writeoff of up to $2,500 would be permitted for frontend costs of organizing a new small business. This will lower the cost of capital associated with a startup business and encourage job creation.

EXEMPT SMALL BUSINESSES FROM ALTERNATIVE MINIMUM TAX

The complexity of the alternative minimum tax [AMT] is staggering to many small businesses. Small businesses are less likely to have the sophisticated accounting systems and expertise that are important in complying with the AMT. This proposal exempts qualified small business taxpayers from the AMT.

INCREASES THE PERMITTED NUMBER OF S CORPORATION SHAREHOLDERS FROM 35 TO 50

S Corporations were designed to help small business owners obtain corporate benefits without having to deal with the Federal tax complexity of traditional corporations. Increasing the maximum number of shareholders will facilitate the use of S Corps by more small businesses.

ACCOUNTING CHANGES: INFLATION ADJUSTED INVENTORY FIFO ACCOUNTING; RELIEF FROM CAPITALIZATION RULES; RELIEF FROM COMPLEX LONG-TERM CONTRACT ACCOUNTING RULES

Many of our current tax accounting rules may provide a more accurate measure of profits, but they wreck havoc on small businesses. The proposed changes would lessen the accounting burden on small businesses letting the owners concentrate on their business as opposed to keeping books.

As I said earlier, this is a start. Any economic stimulus package or future tax bill must include measures aimed at our small business community. Combined with other proposals which are being developed, we will see greater economic growth, higher employment and prosperity for all Americans.

I urge my colleagues to join us in this effort. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

For purposes of the preceding sentence, rules similar to the rules of paragraphs (2) and (3) of section 448(c) shall apply in determining whether a taxpayer has average annual gross receipts that do not exceed $1,000,000.

"(3) INDIRECT COSTS.—For purposes of this subsection, indirect costs are all costs other than direct costs."

(d) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to contracts entered into in taxable years beginning after December 31, 1992.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I am pleased to join today with the Republican leader, the ranking Republican on the Finance Committee, Senator PACKWOOD, and several other of our colleagues, in introducing the Small Business Investment Act of 1993. As ranking Republican on the Senate Small Business Committee, I consider the provisions of this comprehensive small business tax reform plan to be vital components of any economic stimulus program this Congress may enact.

The legislation we introduce today is designed to simplify the Tax Code for small businesses. It would ease the Federal tax compliance burden on small businesses. At the same time, it would create new incentives and improve existing incentives contained in the Federal Tax Code. These incentives would provide additional capital to new and existing small businesses.

Mr. President, entrepreneurs in my home State of South Dakota often tell me that one of the major hurdles they face in getting a small business off the ground is the availability of capital. Three provisions in this bill—increasing the deduction for certain investments from $10,000 to $25,000; allowing immediate expensing of new business startup costs; and exempting small businesses from alternative minimum tax provisions—are designed to reduce the cost of capital, increase cash flow and lower the after tax cost of starting a small business.

Small businesses also often find their attentions diverted and their resources limited by complex Federal mandates. Two sections of our bill—the alternative minimum tax exemption; and a small business exemption from the rules governing long-term contracts—would reduce some of the accounting burdens currently faced by our small businesses.

Mr. President, these and other provisions in our bill are designed to help America's small businesses do what they do best—create jobs and stimulate the economy. In my home State of South Dakota, 95 percent of all businesses are small business. Small businesses employed 74.7 percent of South Dakota's private nonfarm workers in 1990. The Small Business Administration reports that from June 1991 to June 1992, small business nationally created 173,000 jobs, while firms with more than 500 employees lost 235,000 jobs. Small businesses accounted for two out of every three new jobs created from 1982 to 1990.

Clearly, small business is the engine that drives America's economy. If enacted, this bill will help ensure that the train of economic recovery in this country not only stays on the tracks, but picks up steam.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise to tell the Senate a little bit about a bill that was introduced by Senator DOLE, the Republican leader, that I joined, and many of my colleague joined as original cosponsors. It is called the Small Business Investment Act of 1993.

Obviously, back in September 1992, with the Presidential campaign in full swing, President Bush outlined a package of small business tax initiatives that would simplify significantly tax compliance for all small business. It is history now that he lost the election. But this package was so important that he directed Treasury Secretary Brady to go ahead and work out the details of the new initiatives. That legislative package is what we are introducing today.

Small business, as I see it, is the little engine that could. Each one independently puffs away, saying, "I think I can; I think I can." Some fail, but a great majority succeed. Add the millions of small businesses together in the American economy and they make up three-fourths of the jobs that the American people hold today.

You have new innovations; you have the most productive people on Earth. And there is no doubt that we need to promote the small-business sector to ensure future growth and more jobs.

The National Federation of Independent Business, their foundation, has surveys. They talk to small business regularly.

Let me suggest the survey is designed to identify problems and priorities. Last year's survey said, of the 75 potential business problems, the cost of health insurance was by far the most serious problem for small business.

We have all been working on that. Federal taxes on business income rank second. This is a serious worry that small business owners have. Yet, it proved to be only part of a much deeper concern over taxes. Tax issues dominate the first 10 problems on their list: Taxes on income, to cash flow, to workman's compensation, to FICA taxes, to tax regulations.

This package that we introduce today focuses on radically simplifying compliance under the tax laws. The Treasury Department estimates that taken together, the initiatives eliminate 160 million hours of annual recordkeeping and return preparation time by small businesses across this country.

These initiatives will meaningfully reduce capital costs and increase return to small businesses.

This legislation will mean a lot to small businesses everywhere, in Virginia, the State where the occupant of the Chair resides, to New Mexico. Ninety-nine percent of the businesses in my State are small businesses, using the criteria of this bill and elsewhere in the law, under $5 million in sales and less than 500 employees. This legislation will mean more new business formations, expansion of existing ones, higher productivity and new innovations. In essence, it means more jobs.

S. 161. A bill to provide for an endowment grant program to support college access programs nationwide, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

COLLEGE ACCESS ACT

• Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the College Access Act, a bill to establish an endowment grant program to support college access programs nationwide. This important legislation will encourage and enable public high school students to attend institutions of higher education throughout the country. It would authorize a one-time Federal investment of $25 million, an investment which would generate a significant level of support from the private sector for young people who wish to pursue postsecondary education.

College access programs provide a variety of services to disadvantaged young people. Specifically, they provide advisors who serve students in public high schools, offering assistance in addressing student's identified needs for financial aid to attend college, and for information about the college financial aid process and academic qualifications and preparation. Advisors also work to provide incentives for students and to generate interest and motivation in pursuing postsecondary education.

A very important, but often overlooked, service offered through college access programs is the underwriting of costs of preparing for college, including entrance exams, application fees, and SAT and ACT preparation courses. Additional services may include full and partial financial grants—especially "last dollar" gap financing, assistance in selecting and applying to appropriate colleges, and assistance in applying for financial aid. Further services may include underwriting the costs of entering college, including dormitory reservations and college acceptance fees. College access programs also provide continuing mentors for students who attend college, including reimbursing students who act as tutors and peer counselors while in school.

An important aspect of college access programs is the widespread community support they receive—from individuals to the business and foundation sectors, as well as from cities and, in some cases, the State. The success of this approach is very well illustrated by the program operated in Baltimore, MD, by the CollegeBound Foundation. Established by the Greater Baltimore Committee, Mayor Kurt Schmoke, and Baltimoreans United In Leadership Development [BUILD], assistance provided through the CollegeBound Foundation's college access program since its inception has led to a 24-percent increase in the number of Baltimore City public high school students taking the SATs, a 14-percent increase in the percentage of students completing Financial Aid forms, and a 77-percent increase in the number of students who completed college applications.

A 20 year retrospective study of students assisted by the oldest college access program in the Nation, the Cleveland Scholarship Programs [CSP], shows similar results. Nine out of ten of the study's participants had attended a 4-year college, graduated, or gone on to professional or graduate school, 77 percent had finished college, and more than 1 out of 4 had done some postgraduate work. These results are especially significant when you consider that the largest percentage of students served come from families whose annual incomes are between $5,000 and $14,999. Thirty-one percent reported family income between $15,000 and $24,999, and approximately 10 percent come from families with incomes of less than $5,000. Clearly, college access programs are reaching a population of young people who might otherwise never have an opportunity to pursue a higher education.

Mr. President, every society of any consequence attaches enormous importance to educating its next generation. If a society is to develop to its full strength and potential, it is essential to develop the talents and skills of the young. College access programs, which provide services to ensure access to higher education for capable but economically disadvantaged young people, perform an important role in this critical effort. I am very pleased to introduce the College Access Act today and strongly urge my colleagues to join in an effort to ensure its swift passage.●

S. 162. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to allow Indian tribes to receive charitable contributions of inventory; to the Committee on Finance.

INDIAN TRIBES CHARITABLE CONTRIBUTIONS ACT
OF 1993

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation that would expand the current inventory charitable donation rule to include Indian tribes. This proposal is short and simple.

Under current law, companies may obtain a special charitable donation tax deduction under Internal Revenue Code section 170(e)(3) for contributing their excess inventory to the ill, the needy, or infants. While not limited to any particular type of company or inventory, this deduction commonly is used by food processing companies whose excess food inventories otherwise would spoil. Indian tribes have had difficulty obtaining these donations, however, because of an ambiguity in the law as to whether or not donating companies may deduct donations to people on Indian reservations.

The current language in section 170(e)(3) requires charitable donations of excess inventory to be made to organizations that are described in section 501(c)(3) of the Code and exempt from taxation under section 501(a). While Indian tribes are exempt from taxation, they are not among the organizations described in section 501(c)(3). Accordingly, it is not clear that a direct donation of excess inventory to an Indian tribe would qualify for the charitable donation deduction under section 170(e)(3).

Ironically, the Indian Tribal Government Tax Status Act found in section 7871 provides that an Indian tribal government shall be treated as a State for purposes of determining tax deductibility of charitable contributions made pursuant to section 170. Unfortunately, the act does not expressly extend to donations made under section 170(e)(3) because that provision technically does not include States as eligible donees, either.

Mr. President, it is well documented that a disproportionate number of the ill and the needy, many of whom are infants, can be found on Indian reservations. No one would argue that it is not within the intent of section 170(e)(3) to allow contributions to these people to qualify for the special charitable donation deduction in that section of the Code. That is what the bill I am introducing today would do. By allowing companies to make qualified contributions to Indian tribes under section 170(e)(3), the bill would clearly further the intended purpose of both Internal Revenue Code section 170(e)(3) and the Indian Tribal Government Tax Status Act.

The appropriateness of this measure is exhibited by the fact that it was included in H.R. 11, the Revenue Act of 1992, which was vetoed by President Bush. Moreover, at the time it was passed, the measure was supported on policy grounds by the Joint Committee on Taxation and Finance Committee staff.

I strongly encourage my colleagues to take another close look at this bill and consider supporting this worthy and reasonable measure.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 162

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. CHARITABLE CONTRIBUTIONS OF INVENTORY TO INDIAN TRIBES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 170(e)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (relating to special rule for certain contributions of inventory or other property) is amended by adding at the end the following new subparagraph:

“(D) SPECIAL RULE FOR INDIAN TRIBES.—“(i) IN GENERAL.—An Indian tribe (as defined in section 7871(c)(3)(E)(ii)) shall be treated as an organization eligible to be a donee under subparagraph (A).

“(ii) USE OF PROPERTY.—For purposes of subparagraph (A)(i), if the use of the property donated is related to the exercise of an essential governmental function of the Indian tribal government, such use shall be treated as related to the purpose or function constituting the basis for the organization's exemption.”

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1992.●

S. 163. A bill to require the Secretary of the Treasury to perform a study of the structure, operation, practice, and regulation of Japan's capital and securities markets, and their implications for the United States; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

FOREIGN CAPITAL AND SECURITIES MARKETS
STUDY ACT

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting legislation to address a topic with significant consequences for the United States—the structure, operation, and practices of Japan's capital and securities markets.

The Foreign Capital and Securities Markets Study Act, which I introduce today, calls on the Secretary of the Treasury to conduct a year-long study of Japan's capital and securities markets and their implications for the United States. The provisions of the bill are identical to legislation I introduced in the 102d Congress and were included in H.R. 11, the Revenue Act of 1992, which was vetoed by President Bush.

The study called for in the legislation will focus on how the structure and operation of Japan's capital and securities markets provide Japanese manufacturers with competitive advantages against their American counterparts. The study also will examine how these markets, in the way they are structured and operated, pose a risk to American investments, international liquidity, and the stability of international financial markets. The study will touch on several topics that have been the subject of negotiation between the United States and Japan in the Structural Impediments Initiative, such as corporate governance and cross-shareholding, but which have never been studied in the breadth or depth proposed in this legislation.

The time is right for such a study. We have watched with interest the reports of insider dealings, loss-guarantee payments, market manipulation and other irregularities emanating last summer from Japan. We have seen allegations that Nomura Securities, the world's preeminent securities house, consorted with and manipulated stock prices for Japanese gangsters. We have seen disclosures that Japanese securities houses paid more than $1 billion to cover the market losses of favored insiders, which include the world's most powerful industrial corporations.

The Japanese stock market scandals of 1991 are reason enough for this legislation. In today's global financial markets, a scandal of this proportion has international dimensions. We must know how the scandals will affect the United States economy as a whole, as well as American investors, including United States pension funds that have invested billions in the Japanese markets.

What may be more important for the long-term well-being of the United States economy, however, is what the scandals reveal about the structure and operation of the Japanese capital and securities markets. These scandals give us a glimpse into the heart of Japan, Inc. They call our attention to the much broader and fundamental contributions of Japan's financial sector to that country's remarkable postwar economic success. In so doing, the Japanese financial scandal has profound consequences for the United States, reaching from Wall Street in Manhattan to Main Street in Aberdeen, SD.

The consequences are as subtle as they are profound; here are some examples of what I mean:

COST OF CAPITAL

The structure and operation of Japan's securities and capital markets have provided Japanese corporations with access to cheap capital, especially during the "go-go" 1980's. This advantage over their American competitors has allowed Japanese companies to pursue aggressive market and pricing strategies, modernize plant and equipment, conduct extensive research and development programs, acquire American companies, and make other investments to position themselves for global competition in the 1990's. Sony, for example, reportedly raised more than $6 billion in stock and equity-based bond issues between 1987 and 1990. Sony's reported cost of capital for these funds was estimated to be under 1 percent. In the same time frame, Sony acquired CBS Records and Columbia Pictures for a combined total of $5.7 billion. Access to such low-cost funds, when American companies are paying 10 percent or more, can spell the difference between competitive success and failure.

BARRIERS TO TRADE

The structure and operation of Japan's securities markets also have facilitated barriers to United States exports to Japan. In the well-known keiretsu corporate structure, Japanese suppliers and their customers develop longstanding business relationships through reciprocal stable shareholding arrangements, interlocking directorates, and other mutually beneficial stock arrangements. One obligation of the arrangement is continued procurement from the supplier company, which in turn depends heavily upon and works intimately with the keiretsu customer. Such relationships, forged in Japanese securities markets, act to exclude American vendors seeking to penetrate the Japanese market.

ANOTHER FINANCIAL SCANDAL

Japanese banks, including some of the largest banks in the world, are confronting problems similar to those faced by American banks and savings and loans. Japan's real estate and securities markets, which have been marvels of long-term growth, are depressed significantly. This downturn poses a two-pronged threat to Japanese banks. First, loan losses could soar along with surging loan defaults and bankruptcies, especially in the real estate sector. The Economist magazine projects that Japanese bankruptcies could reach into hundreds of billions of dollars over the next few years, with Japanese banks woefully unprepared. Loan loss reserves in Japanese banks are reported to amount to only three trillion yen on 448 trillion yen in outstanding loans.

Second, Japanese banks rely heavily upon securities in their portfolios to meet international capital standards. With the sharp downturn in the Japanese stock market, Japanese banks reportedly have encountered difficulty in meeting those capital standards, and have been forced to take remedial actions like curtailing international lending activity.

This scenario seems disturbingly similar to our own banking and savings and loan debacle. But the implications of Japan's financial problems extend even further. Japanese banks and financial institutions play a critical role in providing international liquidity, including, most importantly for us, the financing of United States Government budget deficits. Serious dislocations in the Japanese financial sector could have global consequences.

In light of the magnitude of these and other questions concerning the implications for the United States of the structure and operation of Japan's securities and capital markets, this proposal is a fair, measured, even cautious response. If United States policy in this vitally important area is to rest on a solid foundation, we must have a comprehensive understanding of the Japanese financial markets and how they affect all Americans.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD in its entirety at the close of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 163

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

By Mr. DASCHLE:

S. 164. A bill to authorize the adjustment of the boundaries of the South Dakota portion of the Sioux Ranger District of Custer National Forest, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

SIoux RANGER DISTRICT ACT OF 1993

• Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, today I am reintroducing legislation to authorize the adjustment of the boundaries of the South Dakota portion of the Sioux Ranger District of Custer National Forest. This legislation was approved last year by the Energy Committee. Although there was no opposition to the bill, S. 1879, it was held up in the final hours of the 102d Congress due to an unrelated dispute regarding other Energy Committee legislation. I am confident it will receive timely consideration in the Senate this year.

Most land exchanges between private landowners and the Forest Service are authorized in accordance with three existing laws. The one relevant to this legislation is the General Exchange Act of 1922, which allows for exchanges of lands only within the exterior boundaries of national forest lands. The national forest boundary usually lies directly adjacent to federally owned lands, and, as a result, lands that are outside the boundary cannot be exchanged even if they are immediately adjacent to the boundary and forest land. The legislation I am introducing today would enable the Secretary of Agriculture to accept title to any lands located within 5 miles of the exterior boundaries of the South Dakota portion of the Sioux Ranger District of Custer National Forest.

Over a period of 50 years, a number of boundary extension laws have been passed to allow land exchange to include lands adjacent to, but outside, national forest boundaries. My legislation would enable the South Dakota portion of the Sioux Ranger District to conduct the kind of land exchanges that the rest of Custer National Forest, and a significant number of other national forests, are already entitled to conduct.

Land exchanges have been used as a tool by the Forest Service and private land owners to increase the management efficiency of their respective holdings, allow consolidation of property ownership and resolve Forest Service management issues such as public access and trespass situations. The Sioux Ranger District has two firm and several tentative land exchange proposals from private landowners that involve lands just outside the forest boundary. This general boundary extension is necessary to facilitate these land exchanges.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this bill, and ask unanimous consent to have the full text of the bill printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 164

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, SECTION 1. SIoux RANGER DISTRICT BOUNDARY ADJUSTMENT.

(a) IN GENERAL.—In accordance with the Act entitled "An Act to consolidate national forest lands", approved March 20, 1922 (16 U.S.C. 485 et seq.), and in exchange for national forest lands in Custer National Forest, the Secretary of Agriculture may accept title to any lands located within 5 miles of the exterior boundaries of the South Dakota portion of the Sioux Ranger District of Custer National Forest that are not owned by the United States and that are found by the Secretary of Agriculture to be chiefly valuable for national forest purposes.

(b) INCORPORATION INTO CUSTER NATIONAL FOREST.—Upon acceptance of title by the Secretary of Agriculture, lands conveyed to the United States in accordance with subsection (a) shall become part of Custer National Forest.

By Mr. WALLOP:

S. 165. A bill to amend chapter 6 of title 5, United States Code, relating to regulatory flexibility analysis; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REGULATORY FLEXIBILITY ANALYSIS ACT OF 1993

• Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, jobs, jobs, jobs. That was the promise Americans heard echoed all across this country last year from those running for the highest office in the land to the smallest local election. Those promises were well focused. Long-term economic growth hinges on growth in our labor force and increases in the productivity of that labor force. If we cannot sustain economic growth, if we do not have a healthy job market, then America can no longer afford to be the steadying presence in foreign affairs, or to be the leader in the area of civil rights, or in environmental awareness, or to stun the world with scientific achievements.

As the 103d Congress convenes and the new administration settles into the White House, I would like to draw attention to one of the biggest obstacles to jobs, growth in the labor force, and productivity of American businesses today. That is the Federal Government itself.

The concept of federalism upon which this country was founded has sadly gone awry. Instead of recognizing the limits of the National Government and that some things are best achieved at the State and local level, or God forbid, by the people themselves, we seem to have accepted the notion that the Federal Government must be all things to all people, and solve all of America's problems from the top down. As a result, we have a Congress that measures success by the number of laws it passes to regulate all aspects of human existence and agency officials whose importance is determined by the number of people working for them, how many rules and regulations they produce each year, and how many enforcement actions are brought against the regulated public.

There is no doubt that all of this started with somebody's good intention or that some may even be necessary, but where do we stop? The Federal Government is the biggest growth industry in this country today and it continues to pass laws, and write rules and regulations to implement those laws, and to cover the country with a network of low-level bureaucrats to enforce all these laws, rules, and regulations until the cumulative effect is to smother the American spirit. There are today more government employees in America than there are jobs in manufacturing.

Alexis DeToqueville, the great French philosopher who wrote the classic study of political institutions, "Democracy in America," foresaw what would happen in his chapter entitled "What Sort of Despotism Democratic Nations Have to Fear." DeToqueville describes a government such as ours as a power that,  covers the surface of society with a network of small complicated rules, minute and uniform, through which even the most original minds and the most energetic characters cannot penetrate to rise above the crowd. The will of man is not shattered, but softened, bent, and guided; men are seldom forced by it to act, but they are constantly restrained from acting. Such a power does not destroy, but it prevents existence; it does not tyrannize, but it compresses, enervates, extinguishes, and stupefies a people, till each nation is reduced to nothing better than a flock of timid and industrious animals, of which the government is the shepherd.

DeToqueville's vision is especially chilling because the government he describes is the all too familiar Government from Washington.

Mr. President, one of our former colleagues left the protective fold of Federal Government to join the forces of struggling businessmen and he had the intestinal fortitude to share with us his experience. I have offered this before, but I believe its powerful message is once again worthy of note as we embark on this new era.

I would like to include for the RECORD an article written by former Senator and Presidential contender, George McGovern, entitled "A Politician's Dream is a Businessman's Nightmare" dated June 1, 1992. George McGovern's Connecticut hotel went bankrupt not just because of a slow economy, but because the Government "set the bar so that it is too high to clear."

McGovern describes how he and other businessmen had to live with rules that were "all passed with the objective of helping employees, protecting the environment, raising tax dollars for schools, protecting our customers from fire hazards, etc." McGovern never doubted the worthiness of any of these goals, but he said that:

The concept that most often eludes legislators is: Can we make consumers pay the higher prices for the increased operating costs that accompany public regulation and government reporting requirements with reams of red tape. It is a simple concern that is nonetheless often ignored by legislators.

We ignore his message at America's peril. George McGovern is right; the problem is not the worthiness of these goals. The problem is that too much government diminishes their worth and restricts the very opportunities and protection they were designed to promote.

How do we prevent a bloated government from steamrolling over the very people it was designed to serve? This is my concern. My staff and I have traveled the State of Wyoming to hear from those who feel the effect firsthand. They wonder, first of all, if Congress or the Federal agencies know what is happening. Second, they would like to see some sort of accountability for the actions of Federal employees who, by invading their lives, threaten their names, and intimidate their families, and coerce their response. Americans today are desperately trying to serve and appease their Government. When we were in school we thought that that was the Government's role, not the citizen's.

Mr. President, I am reintroducing three bills which are based on the simple but valuable advice of my constituents and I ask that they be included in the RECORD following my comments. These bills are designed to help free the American spirit so that innovation, ingenuity, and resourcefulness are rewarded, not thwarted by the Federal Government.

First of all, to ensure that Congress does, in fact, know what it is doing, I am introducing a sense of the Congress resolution which provides that each committee which reports a bill that requires employers to provide new employee benefits, obtains an objective analysis of the impact of the bill on employment and international competitiveness and includes that analysis in the committee report. Congress will then have the opportunity to consider the consequences of its actions before a bill becomes law.

Second, I am introducing amendments to strengthen the law which ensures that Federal agencies know what they are about. This will help provide regulatory relief to small businesses in particular. The 1980 Regulatory Flexibility Act was based on the premise that Federal agencies frequently do not recognize the impact their rules will have or that small businesses are disproportionately and adversely affected by Federal regulation compared to their larger counterparts. My amendments would improve the Regulatory Flexibility Act in three ways; by providing for coverage of interpretative rules, by providing for judicial review and by modifying the definitions to ensure that indirect effects of regulations are considered when an analysis of rules is undertaken.

Under current law no regulatory impact analysis is required for rules classified as interpretative. Unfortunately, some agencies improperly classify rules as interpretative and thus avoid having to perform any analysis of its impact. My amendment would close this loophole by including interpretative rules within coverage of the act.

Also, there is no meaningful judicial review of an agency's decision to certify that a rule does not have a substantial impact on a significant number of entities, even though it may impose tremendous burdens. My amendment would correct this deficiency.

Finally, the original Regulatory Flexibility Act does not take into account the fact that regulations which are imposed on small entities have an indirect impact on the customers and/or clients of those entities. My amendment would ensure that these are properly considered.

The last measure I am introducing today is designed to help ensure that agencies or agency employees who abuse the power of their positions are held accountable for those actions. Low-level bureaucrats have enormous control over many aspects of American life. They literally hold a person's future in the palm of their hands because of the broad authority which they have to issue, withhold or condition permits and to levy fines. Ordinary citizens—businessmen, ranchers, developers, even State and county officials—are afraid to complain or fight against unfair agency action out of fear of reprisal by Federal bureaucrats. Businessmen are so dependent upon permits and the discretion to issue them is so immense that bureaucratic delay, yet alone inaction, is often enough to put someone out of business. My bill is an important first step toward protecting those in the private sector who have blown the whistle against unfair agency action from reprisals by those agencies.

There is more to be done to turn the Government from the direction in which it is headed. Overregulation and governmental redtape are strangling business and economic growth, costing American taxpayers up to $1.6 trillion per year. That is why I plan to continue the Red Tape Award, something I instituted last year with several of my colleagues in order to expose and present an official certificate to the most foolish of foolish governmental regulations. The symbol for this award is the Statue of Liberty bound and gagged in redtape. Perhaps humor can succeed where common sense has failed by serving to highlight just how ridiculous and burdensome our Government can be.

You may recall, Mr. President, that the first recipient of the Red Tape Award was the Occupational Safety and Health Administration [OSHA], for its ridiculous enforcement of the hazardous communication standard. Issued in 1983, this standard requires employers to identify chemical hazards in the workplace and prepare a material safety data sheet [MSDS] on such "hazardous" materials as sawdust, sand, gravel, fire extinguishers, dishwashing liquid, liquid paper, water, and oxygen. Fining small businesses for not having a MSDS on dishwashing detergent is absurd, but that is exactly what happened.

Clearly, we've got to restore some common sense into Government regulation. Presenting the less-than-coveted Red Tape Award on a regular basis, as we plan to do, and thus exposing costly and counterproductive regulations may help that along.

Ours was to be a government of the people, by the people; not a government on the people. The three bills, along with the Red Tape Award, are important steps toward ensuring that the enterprising spirit that made this country great is not slowly and gently crushed until the American people are transformed into a flock of timid workers envisioned by DeTocqueville.

I ask unanimous consent a bill and an article appear in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A POLITICIAN'S DREAM IS A BUSINESSMAN'S NIGHTMARE

(By George McGovern)

It's been 11 years since I left the U.S. Senate, after serving 24 years in high public office. After leaving a career in politics, I devoted much of my time to public lectures that took me into every state in the union and much of Europe, Asia, the Middle East and Latin America.

In 1988, I invested most of the earnings from this lecture circuit acquiring the leasehold on Connecticut's Stratford Inn. Hotels, inns and restaurants have always held a special fascination for me. The Stratford Inn promised the realization of a longtime dream to own a combination hotel, restaurant and public conference facility—complete with an experienced manager and staff.

In retrospect, I wish I had known more about the hazards and difficulties of such a business, especially during a recession of the kind that hit New England just as I was acquiring the inn's 43-year leasehold. I also wish that during the years I was in public office, I had this firsthand experience about the difficulties business people face very day. That knowledge would have made me a better U.S. senator and a more understanding presidential contender.

Today we are much closer to a general acknowledgment that government must encourage business to expand and grow. Bill Clinton, Paul Tsongas, Bob Kerrey and others have, I believe, changed the debate of our party. We intuitively know that to create job opportunities we need entrepreneurs who will risk their capital against an expected payoff. Too often, however, public policy does not consider whether we are choking off those opportunities.

My own business perspective has been limited to that small hotel and restaurant in Stratford, Conn., with an especially difficult lease and a severe recession. But my business associates and I also lived with federal, state and local rules that were passed with the objective of helping employees, protecting the environment, raising tax dollars for schools, protecting our customers from fire hazards, etc. While I never have doubted the worthiness of any of these goals, the concept that most often eludes legislators is: "Can we make consumers pay the higher prices for the increased operating costs that accompany public regulation and government reporting requirements with reams of red tape." It is a simple concern that is nonetheless often ignored by legislators.

For example, the papers today are filled with stories about businesses dropping health coverage for employee. We provided a substantial package for our staff at the Stratford Inn. However, were we operating today, those costs would exceed $150,000 a year for health care on top of salaries and other benefits. There would have been no reasonable way for us to absorb or pass on these costs.

Some of the escalation in the cost of health care is attributed to patients suing doctors. While for one assess the merit of all these claims, I've also witnessed firsthand the explosion in blame-shifting and scapegoating for every negative experience in life.

Today, despite bankruptcy, we are still dealing with litigation from individuals who fell in or near our restaurant. Despite these injuries, not every misstep is the fault of someone else. Not every such incident should be viewed as a lawsuit instead of an unfortunate accident. And while the business owner may prevail in the end, the endless exposure to frivolous claims and high legal fees is frightening.

Our Connecticut hotel, along with many others, went bankrupt for a variety of reasons, the general economy in the Northeast being a significant cause. But that reason masks the variety of other challenges we faced that drive operating costs and financing charges beyond what a small business can handle.

It is clear that some businesses have products that can be priced at almost any level. The price of raw materials (e.g., steel and glass) and life-saving drugs and medical care are not easily substituted by consumers. It is only competition or antitrust that tempers price increases. Consumers may delay purchases, but they have little choice when faced with higher prices.

In services, however, consumers do have a choice when faced with higher prices. You may have to stay in a hotel whole on vacation, but you can stay fewer days. You can eat in restaurants fewer times per month, or forgo a number of services from car washes to shoeshines. Every such decision eventually results in job losses for someone. And often these are the people without the skills to help themselves—the people I've spent a lifetime trying to help.

In short, "one-size-fits-all," rules for business ignore the reality of the marketplace. And setting thresholds for regulatory guidelines at artificial levels—e.g., 50 employees or more, $500,000 in sales—takes no account of other realities, such as profit margins, labor intensive vs. capital intensive businesses, and local market economics.

The problem we face as legislators is: Where do we set the bar so that it is not too high to clear? I don't have the answer I do know that we need to start raising these questions more often.

By Mr. MOYNIHAN:

S. 167. A bill to create a bipartisan commission to recommend ways to strengthen the protection of classified information and eliminate the classification of nonsensitive information; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

PROTECTION AND REDUCTION OF GOVERNMENT SECRECY ACT

• Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, the cold war ends on a pretty note. Across the Nation audiences are watching the movie "JFK" in which a former intelligence officer, sitting on a bench with the Washington Monument in view, explains to a district attorney that the President of the United States was murdered by the military in order to keep that war going for what turned out to be another three decades. Polls would suggest that an overwhelming proportion of American citizens believe something conspiratorial happened, and that whatever it was, the Government isn't telling.

Edward A. Shils wrote about all this far back in the fifties in his invaluable, "The Torment of Secrecy." From Freemasons through Bolsheviks—and now to the Central Intelligence Agency—

The exfoliation and intertwining of the various patterns of belief that the world is dominated by unseen circles of conspirators, operating behind our backs, is one of the characteristic features of modern society. It is radical in its fundamental distrust of the dominant institutions and authorities of modern society.

Sad, of course. But not funny. You lose your liberties that way. Madison to Jefferson, 1793: Perhaps it is a universal truth that the loss of liberty at home is to be charged to provisions against danger, real or pretended, from abroad. I happen to believe that something of this has happened to us. There has been a loss of liberty. By which I am not talking about Red scares and loyalty oaths. But rather liberty in the sense of easiness with ideas, awareness of options, sense of opportunities. The secrecy system has done this to us. The all encompassing, smothering, suffocating secrecy system that we built up during the cold war and which won't go away because its existence is itself a kind of secret.

The new President could do no greater service to the Nation and to his administration than to set about an energetic, determined, public dismantling of said secrecy system. As the system has grown it has become harder and harder for Government officials to discuss vital issues of the day with the American people. It has become harder for colleagues in the scientific community to discuss research and technical breakthroughs with their peers. Millions of Americans working in the Government and in defense industries must submit themselves and their families to the intrusive investigations concomitant to receiving security clearances. Nearly 7 million new documents are classified each year—a fact documented by the Information Security Oversight Offices [ISOO]. We have created an office to oversee the offices that oversee the classifiers. But the ISOO only counts secrets up to top secret. The secret is that the real secrets have even higher classifications. Perhaps they didn't tell that to the people who count the secrets.

One consequence of having 3 million security clearances and 7 million new secrets annually is that classified information is published in the papers every day. If the United States would classify a small volume of truly sensitive information it would require far fewer security clearances. And, consequently, fewer leaks.

Perhaps most important, however, the secrecy system has dulled our senses. It cuts off criticism. And ever so slightly it cautioned against seeming to be soft. Threat analysis in the worst possible condition—there's the ticket to promotion. How else to explain the utter failure of the intelligence community to predict the collapse of the Soviet Union?

Adm. Stansfield Turner has acknowledged this failure. In Foreign Affairs, he wrote of the enormity of the intelligence community failure to forecast the magnitude of the Soviet crisis. Adding, "Today we hear some revisionist rumblings that the CIA did in fact see the Soviet collapse emerging after all. Some might, he conceded. But on this one, the corporate view missed by a mile.

Owen Harries has written of the 1980's, that conservatives correctly perceived totalitarianism as an unmitigated evil that had to be fought at all costs. There is an alternative view. It is that the cold war institutions put in place in the late 1940's gradually mutated: From informing policy to making it. There was nothing conspiratorial about this. Organizations believe that way. But we ended up with a President who thought we might have to hold off the Commies at Harlingen, TX. Two days' drive, as Mr. Reagan put it, from Nicaragua. And so we became the world's largest debtor. Acheson spotted it at the time:

I had the gravest forebodings about this organization [the CIA] and warned the President that as set up neither he, the National Security Council, nor anyone else would be in a position to know what it was doing or to control it.

But then, he had insufficient foreboding about the National Security Council. In short order, it would replace the State Department in the Executive Office Building, and the NSC Director would at times displace the Secretary of State.

For what it's worth, in 1970 a task force organized by the Defense Science Board and headed by Dr. Frederick Seitz proposed just this:

The task force noted that more might be gained than lost if our Nation were to adopt—unilaterally, if necessary—a policy of complete openness in all areas of information. * * * [A]ll areas.

But then they decided it wasn't practical. But today it is. We have the freedom to simultaneously reduce Government secrecy dramatically and hold closer those small number of true national security secrets.

Mr. President, this is a subject that deserves the most immediate attention. For that reason, I am introducing today legislation to create a bipartisan commission on reducing and protecting Government secrecy. I believe that this should be one of the earliest national security priorities of the first post-cold-war Presidency.

I send the legislation to the desk and ask unanimous consent that the text of the legislation be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 167

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

TITLE I. SHORT TITLE

SEC. 101. This Act may be cited as the "Protection and Reduction of Government Secrecy Act".

TITLE II: COMMISSION ON PROTECTING AND REDUCING GOVERNMENT SECRECY

SEC. 201. PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this title to establish a study commission which will examine the implications of the systematic over classification of information and to make recommendations to reduce the volume of information classified and to strengthen the protection of legitimately classified information.

SEC. 202. FINDINGS.—(a) Following World War II the United States and the Soviet Union engaged in a global conflict known as the cold war;

(b) During the cold war a secrecy system developed to enormous proportions, thereby limiting the public's access to vital information and reducing the ability of the public to participate with full knowledge in the process of governmental decisionmaking;

(c) In 1990 6,797,720 documents were classified and approximately 3 million persons held some form of security clearance;

(d) The burden of managing nearly 7 million newly classified documents every year has led to reduced communication within the Government and within the scientific community, reduced communication between the Government and the people of the United States, tremendous administrative expense and the selective and unauthorized public disclosure of classified information;

(e) The requirement that approximately 3 million persons obtain security clearances represents a substantial loss of individual privacy which is inconsistent with American traditions;

(f) If a smaller amount of truly sensitive information was classified expense, lost privacy and inhibitions on public discussion would be reduced and the remaining classified information could be held more securely;

(g) In 1970 a task force organized by the Defense Science Board and headed by Dr. Frederick Seitz concluded that "more might be gained than lost if our Nation were to adopt—unilaterally, if necessary—a policy of complete openness in all areas of information;" and

(h) A bipartisan study commission specially constituted for the purpose of examining the consequences of the secrecy system will be able to offer comprehensive proposals for reform.

SEC. 203. FUNCTION OF THE COMMISSION.—(a) The function of the Commission shall be—

(1) to conduct an investigation into all matters in any way related to any legislation, executive order, regulation, practice or procedure relating to the access to or the classification of information or involving security clearances, including without limitation access to classified information under the Freedom of Information Act;

(2) to make such recommendations concerning the classification of national security information as the Commission shall see fit, including proposing new legislation.

SEC. 204. COMPOSITION OF THE COMMISSION.—(a) To carry out the purposes of this title, there is established a Commission on the Protection and Reduction of government Secrecy (hereafter referred to in this title as the "Commission").

(b) The Commission shall be composed of the following 12 members:

(1) Four members appointed by the President, two from the executive branch of the Government and two from private life;

(2) Four members appointed by the President of the Senate, two from the Senate (one from each of the two major political parties) and two from private life; and

(3) Four members appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, two from the House of Representatives (one from each of the two major political parties) and two from private life.

(c) The Commission shall elect a Chairman and a Vice Chairman from among its members.

(d) Seven members of the Commission shall constitute a quorum. Any vacancy in the Commission shall not affect its powers, but shall be filled in the same manner in which the original appointment was made.

(e) Compensation and Travel Expenses.

(1) COMPENSATION IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in paragraph (2), each member of the Commission may be compensated at not to exceed the daily equivalent of the annual rate of basic pay in effect for grade GS-18 of the General Schedule under section 5332 of title 5, United States Code, for each day during which that member is engaged in the actual performance of the duties of the Commission.

(2) GOVERNMENT PERSONNEL.—Members of the Commission who are full-time officers or employees of the United States or Members of Congress shall receive no additional pay on account of their service on the Commission.

(3) TRAVEL EXPENSES.—While away from their homes or regular places of business in the performances of services for the Commission, members of the Commission shall be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, in the same manner as persons employed intermittently in the Government service are allowed expenses under section 5703(b) of title 5, United States Code.

SEC. 205. POWERS OF THE COMMISSION.—(a) The Commission, or on the authorization of the Commission, any subcommittee or member thereof, may, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this title, hold such hearings and sit and act at such times and places, administer such oaths, and require, by subpoena or otherwise, the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memorandums, papers, and documents as the Commission or such subcommittee or member may deem advisable. Subpoenas may be issued under the signature of the Chairman of the Commission, of any such subcommittee, or any designated member, and may be served by any person designated by such Chairman or member. The provisions of sections 102 through 104 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (2 U.S.C. 192–194) shall apply in the case of any failure of any witness to comply with any subpoena or to testify when summoned under authority of this section.

(b) The Commission is authorized to secure directly from any executive department, bureau, agency, board, commission, office, independent establishment, or instrumentality information, suggestions, estimates, and statistics for the purposes of this title. Each such department, bureau, agency, board, commission, office, establishment, or instrumentality is authorized and directed, to the extent authorized by law, to furnish such information, suggestions, estimates, and statistics directly to the Commission, upon request made by the Chairman or Vice Chairman.

SEC. 206. STAFF OF THE COMMISSION.—(a) The Commission shall have power to appoint and fix the compensation of such personnel as it deems advisable, without regard to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates.

(b) The Commission is authorized to procure the services of experts and consultants in accordance with section 3109 of title 5, United States Code, but at rates not to exceed the daily rate paid a person occupying a position at GS-18.

SEC. 207. EXPENSES OF THE COMMISSION.—There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this title.●

By Mr. GLENN (for himself and Mr. AKAKA):

S. 168. A bill to provide for procedures for the review of Federal department and agency regulations, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

REGULATORY REVIEW SUNSHINE ACT OF 1993

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Regulatory Review Sunshine Act of 1993. This legislation, which is very similar to a bill I introduced in the last Congress, is designed to bring greater openness and public accountability to the Federal regulatory process.

Regulation is the primary means by which our Nation's laws are implemented. It is also the means by which our businesses and citizens too often experience the heavy hammer of big government. To serve its beneficial purpose, Congress and the courts have, over the course of 50 years, developed administrative procedures to make the Federal agency rulemaking process fair, reasonable, and accountable. To blunt its burdens, Presidents have more recently experimented with regulatory review requirements to try to make Federal rules less burdensome, more beneficial, and less costly.

I, for one, support both developments. Administrative procedures are needed to assure the American public that Government regulations are drafted with public participation and can be held up to judicial review. Likewise, regulatory review is needed to assure the American public that agencies are not overzealous or biased, that the Federal Government speaks with one consistent voice, and that regulations only be used where absolutely needed, with the most benefit and the least cost.

Unfortunately, over the last decade, regulatory review has been used not so much to improve rulemaking but to control it. In the last 2 years, particularly, I have seen how White House staff can use regulatory review to give special access to friendly interests, to secretly pressure agency officials to make politically favored decisions, and to hide decisions from congressional oversight. This mode of operation, as seen in the activities of the Council on Competitiveness, is unacceptable. It destroys the integrity of the rulemaking process and further undermines the faith of the American people in the institutions of government.

My legislation, almost identical to the bill that was reported favorably by the Committee on Governmental Affairs, with a bipartisan vote, in the 102d Congress, provides basic public accountability requirements to ensure that the public has fair notice of what proposals are undergoing review, who outside of government is trying to lobby the review process, and to what extent regulatory review affects any rulemaking decision. The legislation would also impose reasonable time limits on regulatory review—OMB officials have admitted that they used delay to surreptitiously stop agency rulemaking.

The legislation stops at these public accountability provisions. As in the last Congress, with the last President, I believe that the structure of regulatory review should still be left to the President. If we have an assurance of public accountability and faithful implementation of statutory mandates, I think it best to defer to the President's design and operation of a central review mechanism. If, of course, sunshine is not enough, then I will revisit this issue.

I introduce this bill just as a new administration begins, and before the issuance of any new regulatory review directives. I look forward to working with the new administration on this issue and hope that my legislation will provide a standard by which they may evaluate the regulatory review system they have inherited and develop a system of their own.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy and summary of the legislation be placed into the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF THE REGULATORY REVIEW SUNSHINE ACT OF 1993

This legislation establishes procedures to ensure public accountability for presidential review of Federal agency rulemaking activity. The bill is very similar to legislation introduced in the 102nd Congress (S. 1942) and reported favorably by the Governmental Affairs Committee by a bi-partisan vote on November 22, 1991 (S. Rpt. 102-256).

Sec. 1. Short Title.

The Act is the "Regulatory Review Sunshine Act of 1993."

Sec. 2. Definitions.

The definitions of "regulatory review," "reviewing entity," "review action" and "rulemaking activity" reflect the Act's purpose to cover any executive branch regulatory review process created by the President or his designee.

Sec. 3. Disclosure By A Reviewing Entity. Reviewing entities must make the following information available to the public within 14 days of concluding review:

(1) All written communications between the reviewing entity and any non-governmental party or the rulemaking agency;

(2) A summary of substantive oral communications between the reviewing entity and any non-governmental party;

(3) A written explanation of any significant review action;

(4) Notices of any extension of regulatory review.

Sec. 4. Disclosure To A Rulemaking Agency By A Reviewing Entity.

Reviewing entities must give rulemaking agencies:

(1) Written communications between the reviewing entity and any non-governmental party;

(2) A summary of substantive oral communications between the reviewing entity and non-governmental parties, and an invitation to attend meetings with such parties; and

(3) A written explanation of significant review actions.

Sec. 5. Public Disclosure By A Rulemaking Agency.

Rulemaking agencies must place materials received from a reviewing entity in the rulemaking record, identify upon request proposals under review, and explain in rulemaking notices any significant changes made to a rule as a result of regulatory review.

Sec. 6. Time Limits For Review.

Regulatory review must be concluded within 60 days. The reviewing entity may, for good cause explained to the rulemaking agency, extend its review for 30 days. Also, if the President, or his designee, reviews a regulatory review issue, the time limits may be extended. Such review is subject to the Act's disclosure requirements.

The reviewing entity must notify the rulemaking agency of any extension beyond 60 days. The rulemaking agency must then publish a notice in the Federal Register.

Sec. 7. Public Accounting Of Regulatory Review.

OMB will prepare monthly and annual public accountings of the regulatory review activities of all reviewing entities. Each rulemaking agency will publish a monthly Federal Register notice of all rulemaking activities under review.

Sec. 8. Exclusions.

Oral communications with the President, the Vice President, the Administrator of EPA, the OMB Director, and the heads of Cabinet agencies are not covered by this Act.

Sec. 9. Effect of Act.

The Act neither authorizes regulatory review nor alters any rulemaking authority, criteria, or deadline.

S. 169. A bill to prohibit the solicitation or diversion of funds to carry out activities forbidden by law; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

DIVERSION OF FUNDS PROHIBITION ACT

• Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, Theodore Draper said of the Iran-Contra episode that—

[i]f the constitutional democracy of the United States is overthrown, we now have a better idea of how this is likely to be done.

The Iran-Contra affair is often portrayed as a threat to the Congress, but it is not appreciated how severely it damaged the Presidency as well. Ronald Reagan came near to impeachment. And George Bush leaves office after, as President Clinton put it in his inaugural, a half-century of service to this country, with a lawyer at his side. This, in large part, because aides to the President liberated themselves from the most fundamental of all constitutional constraints on the executive branch, the congressional power of the purse.

In December 1983 the Reagan administration's "Special Interagency Group" decided to bring the situation in Nicaragua to a head with speedboat attacks, minings and other operations. These clearly fell within the definition of "significant anticipated intelligence activities" and yet the Congress was not "fully and currently informed" of these activities as required by law. The Intelligence Committees were ambiguously briefed only after the minings had occurred. The uproar when the minings were publicly disclosed, it led within the year to legislation ending funding for the Contras.

From that point forward the search began for alternative sources of funding. Those sources included funds solicited from foreign states, the use of United States property to arrange quid pro quos to support forbidden activities and, of course, the ill-fated skimming of profits from the sale of arms to Iran. A policy of illegality mutated into a policy of deceit which nearly wrecked the Reagan presidency.

Mr. President, the legislation that I am introducing today is offered with these events in mind. It makes it a crime to circumvent the constitutional power of the purse. It protects the President by preventing his aides from obtaining the means to carry out activities that violate the law. Our distinguished majority leader summed up this legislation in a single sentence: it simply says "Obey the law." And the Congress has already adopted this bill once, only to see it vetoed by President Bush.

Mr. President, we are embarked upon a new beginning with a new President. It is a hopeful moment. I offer this legislation in an effort to support and protect the President and to help safeguard him from the excesses that so nearly wrecked the administrations of his predecessors.

I send the legislation to the desk and ask unanimous consent that the text of the legislation be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 170. A bill to award a Congressional Gold Medal in honor of the late John Birks "Dizzy" Gillespie; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

DIZZY GILLESPIE CONGRESSIONAL GOLD MEDAL ACT

• Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I rise today in remembrance of John Birks "Dizzy" Gillespie who passed away earlier this month at the age of 75.

Dizzy Gillespie was born in Cheraw, SC, on October 21, 1917—the same year that the first jazz record was recorded—and in his lifetime captured the hearts and ears of people all over the world. From his early beginnings as that dizzy trumpet player from down south to his current status as one of the legends of modern jazz, Dizzy Gillespie clearly exhibited his astounding versatility as a performer, innovator, and ambassador of jazz.

Along with the late Charlie "Bird" Parker, Dizzy spearheaded the musical drive toward a style known as bebop—a fresh harmonic and rhythmic vocabulary that transformed jazz. In addition, he was widely heralded for his successful experimentation in fusing traditional jazz with Afro-Cuban music.

But beyond his undeniable talent and proficiency, Dizzy Gillespie must also be praised for the countless hours that he spent sharing his craft with the peoples of the world. In 1956, Dizzy was the first jazz musician to be appointed by the Department of State to tour on behalf of the United States of America. After his initial success, this cultural statesman continued to criss-cross the globe performing the music that so many have come to love.

Mr. President, during the 102d Congress, I introduced legislation to honor Dizzy Gillespie with the Congressional Gold Medal. While 43 Senators joined me in cosponsoring this bill, we were unable to bring it before the full Senate prior to Congress' adjournment sine die. Today, I am reintroducing this legislation. I hope that my colleagues will again join me in honoring the enduring legacy that Dizzy Gillespie has left for all of us.

In his autobiography Dizzy Gillespie confided that " * * * I would like to be remembered as a humanitarian * * * maybe my role in music is just a stepping stone to a higher role. The highest role is the role in service to humanity, and if I can make that, then I'll be happy." As millions around the world will continue to attest, he did, indeed, make it. I ask unanimous consent that the full text of this bill be printed in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 170

S. 171. A bill to establish the Department of the Environment, provide for a Bureau on Environmental Statistics and a Presidential Commission on Improving Environmental Protection, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

DEPARTMENT OF THE ENVIRONMENT ACT OF 1993

• Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the 1993 Department of the Environment Act. This legislation, which I have introduced twice before, would make the Environmental Protection Agency a Cabinet-level department. The bill I set before the Senate today is essentially the same proposal which was agreed upon by this body on October 1, 1991, except that it does not contain the private property rights amendment added last year by Senator SYMMS.

The United States and the world stand at a dangerous but opportune crossroad. Here and around the globe environmental problems pose significant threats to the health and safety of billions. There is new and growing recognition of the urgent need to address the problems of global warming, ozone depletion, water, air, and sea pollution, and radioactive hazards. Such problems are testing the mettle of governments to develop innovative, comprehensive, and cost-effective solutions that recognize the fragility of our ecosystems and the vulnerability of our people.

Mr. President, in the almost 3 years since I first introduced legislation to elevate the EPA, environmental problems facing our Nation have not improved—in some cases they have grown more dangerous and complex. The waste tanks containing high-level radioactive wastes at the Hanford site in Washington State remain a dangerous threat to public health and safety. Hundreds of Superfund priority list sites remain untouched as the endless battles of bureaucracy and resources wage on. On many fronts, we are still struggling to clean our water, air, and land.

Now, more than ever, we need a Cabinet-level Department of the Environment. I say this because more than one pundit has observed over the past year that such an elevation is merely a cosmetic and political facelift for an agency that can't seem to get its job done in its current status. Well, I don't disagree that improvements can be made at the EPA. The Governmental Affairs Committee, which I chair, held hearings last year on management problems at the agency. As this year's effort proceeds I hope to make further refinements and improvements to this legislation which reflect what we have learned.

But the fact that the agency can improve in no way diminishes the importance of making it Cabinet level. It remains a fact of diplomatic life, for example, that the seriousness with which one views another government's concerns is influenced by the stature of the person who articulates them. A sub cabinet EPA sends the wrong signal to the rest of the world about the priority and leadership given by the United States to the cause of global environmental protection. Moreover, can anyone truly claim that there should be no room at the Cabinet table for the agency that bears the enormous responsibility for the basic elements of nature that sustain life? Indeed, the real and potential impacts on the human environment of our fragile Earth may be of such magnitude that they will require a level of attention never before imagined both abroad and here at home. The United States must provide aggressive leadership toward a solution of domestic and global environmental problems. To do otherwise would consign the quality of life of all Americans to the decisions of other nations and cede our moral obligation to protect the global commons we all share.

At home, a Cabinet-level EPA will be more competitive in garnering the resources it needs to carry out its burgeoning responsibilities. The increased clout of a Department of the Environment will have beneficial ripple effects throughout all of its programs and activities.

Along with making EPA a Cabinet-level agency, the bill also establishes a Bureau of Environmental Statistics to analyze, compile, and publish data necessary to shape environmental policies. In addition, the legislation authorizes the establishment of a Presidential Commission on Improving Environmental Protection and calls for new measures by the United States to promote energy conservation in connection with multilateral foreign assistance programs.

The bill also calls for the convening in our country of an international meeting on energy efficiency and renewable resources and urges the establishment of an international greenhouse gas monitoring program under the auspices of the U.N. Environment Program and the World Meteorological Organization.

Having had the rare privilege to view the Earth in all of its beauty and grandeur from space, I am struck by how thin and fragile the environment is that sustains life on our planet. This vision, I am gratified to find, is now becoming widely shared. Through the hard work and persistence of people who have dedicated their lives to protecting the environment, we now stand at the threshold of an important and positive change. I am confident that the creation of a Department of the Environment will strengthen our Nation's commitment to help protect this delicate and wonderful planet. I am looking forward to working with the new administration to accomplish this early in the session. ●

● Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, recognizing the urgent need to place the environment at the center of the Nation's agenda, I am pleased to join as an original cosponsor of the Department of the Environment Act of 1993. I commend and thank Senator GLENN for his continued leadership on the bill.

The fundamental reason for creating such a department is that the environment has become a strategic issue that demands a coordinated response at the highest level of government. As Vice President AL GORE and others have compellingly argued, at stake are not only the health of the Nation's lakes, rivers, forests, and wetlands, and the quality of life for our citizens, but the ecological integrity of the planet. Problems like global warming and the loss of biodiversity have brought the environment to the top of the international agenda. Domestically, a variety of local and regional problems, including urban ozone and unacceptable lead levels in children, persist in threatening our environment and our health. These problems are not simple. Solving them will require political leadership and clear plans of action.

These plans must integrate environmental protection objectives with other national objectives. Environmental protection is inexorably linked with the economy. Over the long term, a healthy economy depends on a productive work force and a healthy environment. Environmental regulation has returned major economic benefits through, for example, reducing health care costs, and has spurred a strong domestic pollution control industry. The Office of Technology Assessment estimates that the global market for environmental goods and services will grow to $300 billion by the year 2000. This expanding market presents enormous economic opportunities for U.S. firms. Unfortunately, the United States' absence of a coherent national policy to encourage the development of environmental technology threatens to leave America behind in the emerging worldwide industry. The strategic challenge we now face is to design environmental programs that further both environmental and economic goals.

A Department of the Environment will need to work with other Government agencies and private institutions to achieve environmental goals. It will need to employ an array of new policy tools that complement the traditional command and control environmental regulatory scheme. For example, the Department must further pollution prevention, and strengthen the economic incentives for reducing pollution. It should also assume a new role in promoting the development and widespread use of environmentally clean technologies.

The Department of the Environment will not be the only important Federal factor in environmental policy. Transportation and Energy Policy, for example, will be central to any strategy for reducing greenhouse gas emissions. Agricultural policy will continue to have a far reaching effect on water quality. But the Department of the Environment will be poised to be the central player in meeting today's environmental challenges. A Cabinet-level Department of the Environment will be better positioned to provide leadership on international issues, promote changes in our fundamental approaches to environmental protection, and further consideration of the environment within other Government agencies.

Currently, the Environmental Protection Agency stands alone among its Western partners as a sub-Cabinet agency. As witnesses have testified regarding earlier versions of this bill, this hampers EPA's effectiveness by signaling that the United States does not consider the environment to be of primary importance. Elevating EPA to a Department will correct any misimpressions.

More important, Cabinet status will place EPA on equal footing with the many other departments that have a substantial influence on global, regional, and local environmental quality. Policies in these sectors rarely have environmental protection as a primary goal, but often have an important effect on the quality of our land, sea, and air. In recent years EPA has made strides in working with other Federal agencies to address environmental concerns, but it has only cracked the tip of the iceberg. Cabinet status will foster policy integration.

Cabinet status will also give EPA a stronger voice as it advances new approaches to environmental protection. A Department of the Environment could more authoritatively promote pollution prevention among individuals, firms, and governments. A Cabinet-level organization will also be better positioned to strengthen current economic incentives for pollution prevention, particularly in sectors governed by other Cabinet-level departments.

This bill elevates the EPA to a Cabinet-level agency in a straightforward manner. It establishes a Commission on Improving Environmental Protection and charges it with examining and making recommendations on better integrating Federal environmental laws that overlap with those in its jurisdiction. But it does not change or question EPA's current mandates. Nevertheless, as the leading Federal environmental institution the EPA must be ready to meet new and emerging challenges.

When Congress established the EPA 23 years ago, the Agency's mission was no less urgent than today. Smog plagued our cities, poorly contained toxic waste leached into drinking water supplies, and in too many communities raw sewage poisoned our lakes and rivers. But the scope and complexity of EPA's tasks are even more daunting now. Today's EPA—tomorrow's USDE—will lead the Nation's effort to preserve our future. No mission could be more worthy of Cabinet status.●

S. 172. A bill to establish the Spring Mountains National Recreation Area in Nevada, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

SPRING MOUNTAIN NATIONAL RECREATION ACT
● Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce today the Spring Mountain National Recreation Area Act which designates approximately 316,000 acres of the Toiyabe National Forest as a national recreation area.

The Spring Mountain range is a unique natural resource located about 35 miles west of Las Vegas, NV. It includes the 43,000 acre Mt. Charleston Wilderness Area, designated in 1989.

Mt. Charleston is the third highest mountain in Nevada, towering 11,918 feet above the surrounding desert landscape. The proposed national recreation area contains five vegetative zones, a variety of wildlife resources, and the beginning of the aquifer that serves the Las Vegas area.

The Spring Mountain Range wildlife includes elk, deer, wild turkeys, bighorn sheep, golden eagles, wild horses, and burros. It also includes a variety of plant species found nowhere else in the world, coniferous forests, several campground and picnic areas, as well as a ski area.

By designating this area as a national recreation area, greater resources can be dedicated to the conservation and management of the resources, as well as to enhance the public recreation opportunities that this unique area offers for the citizens of the nearby urban area with a population rapidly nearing the 1 million mark.

The legislation directs that the Secretary of Agriculture develop within 3 years a comprehensive management plan for the area and authorizes the necessary appropriations to carry out the recreation and management improvements specified in the plan.

I believe this legislation has great merit, and I will urge its early consideration and adoption.●

S. 173. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to provide for a more gradual period of transition (under a new alternative formula with respect to such transition) to the changes in benefit computation rules enacted in the Social Security Amendments of 1977 as such changes apply to workers born in the years after 1916 and before 1927 (and related beneficiaries) and to provide for increases in such worker's benefits accordingly, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

SOCIAL SECURITY ADJUSTMENT REFORM ACT
● Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I rise to introduce the Social Security Adjustment Reform Act of 1993. I have been a longtime supporter of legislation to correct the glaring inequity in our Social Security System known as the notch problem. In previous Congresses dating as far back as the 99th Congress, I have cosponsored legislation to address this notch disparity. I had expected to cosponsor a bill originally crafted by former Senator Terry Sanford. Unfortunately, my dear friend and colleague lost his reelection bid and could not be here today to lead his notch coalition in this new Congress. While we have lost our vigilant leader, Senator Sanford, our coalition is certainly not giving up the fight. Therefore, Senators HARKIN, HEFLIN, HOLLINGS, SHELBY, DASCHLE, BURNS, MIKULSKI, PRESSLER, PELL, BRYAN, and I are reintroducing the Sanford Social Security Notch Adjustment Reform Act of 1993.

Mr. President, Social Security payroll contributions and benefits are based upon wages earned. However, because of inflation, increases in benefits are needed to maintain an adequate standard of living for retirees. In 1977, the Congress sought to ensure that these increases would occur automatically in response to rising prices, rather than being dependent upon a mandate from Congress, which might reflect partisan politics. With this intention, Congress changed the formula used to calculate increases so that it would be based on prices, rather than wages. Economic theory suggested that wages tend to rise nearly twice as fast as prices. So if increases were based on prices, benefit levels would keep pace with inflation, but the contributions being paid into the trust funds would increase faster, keeping pace with wage levels. This would ensure the solvency of the trust fund.

Unfortunately, that wage-price economic theory failed. Wages were rising only slightly faster than prices and the Social Security pension fund began to pay out more than it had available and was in danger of bankruptcy. Congress soon realized its mistake and in 1977 it again adjusted the formula for calculating benefits to prevent the Social Security trust funds from going broke.

However, since the 1977 formula provides a lower benefit than the benefit provided by the 1972 formula, and since activating that change immediately would have caused a reduction in benefits for people already receiving Social Security, Congress provided for a period of transition to allow time for people to alter their retirement plans and make decisions based on knowledge of what their Social Security benefits would be.

To its credit, the 1977 law did prevent the Social Security trust funds from becoming insolvent. However, the current debate regarding the notch issue is over how much notice must be given to individuals before the new benefit levels are activated. I have maintained that the original transition period, 6 to 10 years, was far too short to give adequate notice to the people who had or were in the process of making retirement decisions. This short time frame has worked to the detriment of those retirees who fall in the notch category and receive the middle benefit, but who at age 56 to 60 were too close to retirement to change decisions they had made based on their expected Social Security benefits.

Mr. President, the notch benefit level as it exists today is simply not fair. It is not fair to honest, hard working Americans who responsibly planned for their retirement, anticipating certain income levels from their Social Security benefits. We say over and over again that Americans must plan and save and invest for their future. We should not penalize them by turning the tables on them and changing the rules at what is essentially the last minute.

The legislation I am offering today would correct this grossly unfair situation by enhancing benefit levels during the transition years and extending the transition period to also protect anyone born between 1922 and 1929. It is a fair compromise and it is high time we face up to our mistakes and pass this important legislation.

Again, I thank Senator Sanford for his leadership on this issue and pledge that I will pick up the flag and carry on the fight to make his bill a reality.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my bill be inserted in the RECORD immediately following the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 173

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Social Security Notch Adjustment Act of 1993".

SEC. 2. EXPANSION OF PERIOD OF TRANSITION; NEW ALTERNATIVE FORMULA WITH RESPECT TO SUCH PERIOD.

(a) EXPANSION OF PERIOD OF TRANSITION.—Section 215(a)(4)(B)(i) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 415(a)(4)(B)(i)) is amended by striking "1984" and inserting "1989".

(b) ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW TRANSITIONAL FORMULA.—Section 215(a) of such Act (42 U.S.C. 415(a)) is amended by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(8)(A) Paragraphs (1) (except for subparagraph (C)(i) thereof) and (4) do not apply to the computation or recomputation of a primary insurance amount for an individual who had wages or self-employment income credited for one or more years prior to 1979, and who was not eligible for an old-age or disability insurance benefit, and did not die, prior to January 1979, if in the year for which the computation or recomputation would be made the individual's primary insurance amount would be greater if computed or recomputed under subparagraph (B).

"(B) The primary insurance amount computed or recomputed under this subparagraph is equal to the sum of the amount which would be computed under this subsection if this paragraph were not applied, plus the product (not less than zero) derived by multiplying—S

"(i) the excess of the adjusted old-law benefit amount over the new-law benefit amount, by

(c) PROSPECTIVE APPLICABILITY.—The amendments made by this Act shall apply only with respect to benefits for months after November 1993.

Mr. SHELBY. Mr. President, I would like to express my strong support of Senator DECONCINI's notch correction legislation. During my tenure in the Senate I have supported numerous efforts at notch reform. This will mark my fourth Congress in the Senate and not coincidentally my fourth cosponsorship of the so-called notch bill. I have shared the frustration of the other proponents of notch reform in the Senate at our inability to pass a notch reform bill. In the spirit of change that currently permeates the Congress and the Executive, I would hope that the Senate finds the will to at last act on the notch bill during this Congress. Essentially, Mr. President, the persistent objection to correcting notch discrimination involves the two claims that notch reform will break the Social Security trust fund and that the so-called notch babies are not discriminated against. Both of these arguments fall in the light of close scrutiny.

When the now infamous notch was created in 1977, no one in good faith intended to discriminate against those retirees born between 1917 and 1921. In an attempt to end the explosion in payment rates from the 1972 benefit formula, Congress changed the formula in 1977. However, eligible retirees from January 1979 and beyond who were born between 1917 and 1921 were placed under a transitional formula or the 1977 formula, depending upon which formula provided the higher benefit. The result of these changes was to provide higher benefits for those who were born in or before 1916 than to those born during the notch period. While the discrepancy is not inordinately large for those who retired at age 62, those retiring at age 65 or beyond who were born during the notch period receive substantially lower benefits than those born before 1916. A person born in 1916 and retiring in 1983 received $716 per month in initial benefits. A person born in 1917 and retiring in 1983 received $592 per month in initial benefit payments.

Mr. President, something is seriously flawed here. Notch retirees are clearly receiving significantly less benefits than their counterparts under the old formula. Not only is the notch problem unfair, but it also punishes individuals who worked longer and paid more money into the Social Security trust fund. As a reward for remaining in the workforce until age 65 and paying Social Security taxes until retirement, the notch retiree receives substantially less money than the age 62 retiree or the retiree born before 1916.

Injustice is often present but unrecognized. However, when we know of an injustice and do not act to correct it, we actively discriminate. We have known about the notch problem for years but have refused to correct it. Regardless of whether the notch babies were targeted to be cheated in 1977, they are clearly being discriminated against now. We know about the problem. We recognize the problem's effects. We should fix the problem, Mr. President. Anything less is indeed discrimination.

Opponents of notch reform claim that correcting the notch would ultimately bankrupt or imperil the trust fund. Under Senator DECONCINI's formula this would not occur. The Social Security trust fund will exceed $1.3 trillion by the year 2000. Because Senator DECONCINI's bill provides for significant transition period for the correction of the notch disparity, the Social Security Administration estimates that trust fund growth will fall by about $60 billion over 10 years under the formula in this legislation. This amounts to only $6 billion per year on average. Relevant to other entitlement expenditures, $6 billion per year is nothing. This bill is a cautious and wise approach to correcting the notch injustice. The notch bill will in no way reduce the fund by a damaging or significant amount.

Mr. President, if we were arguing over the difference of $100 per month when dealing with benefits of $25,000 per year, then opponents of notch reform might have a valid objection to this bill. However, $100 a month to a Social Security recipient scraping by on less than $10,000 per year is a fortune. Let us remember that the vast majority of the notch retirees are dependent on Social Security as their only source of income. Let us remember, Mr. President, that in most cases the notch retiree truly needs the extra income that this amendment will provide.

Mr. President, the case here is clear. The notch problem is real and it has reached the point of neglect and discrimination. Every year the Congress pays lip service to notch reform. We tell notch retirees that we are determined to correct the problem. Then we all cosponsor legislation to correct the problem. Subsequently, however, the notch bill stays in committee and another Congress expires. I would hope that we are not delaying notch reform in the hope that the affected age group dies before we are forced to act.

I hope that we have the will to act during this Congress before it is too late for the notch babies. I urge my colleagues to actively support this legislation.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my friend and colleague, Senator DECONCINI, in calling for a long-overdue solution to the notch problem that is of such concern to many of our senior citizens. As I travel throughout my State of Alabama, one of the issues that I hear about most often is the Social Security notch problem. This has been the case for a number of years.

The notch problem in the Social Security system is one of which we are all well aware, yet is also one in which a solution, or even a serious debate, continues to elude us. During past Congresses, I have sponsored legislation in the Senate to correct this problem. Unfortunately, these bills were never brought to the floor for consideration. This inaction by the Congress has led to a disillusionment among those who are so unfairly affected by this problem, and many have justifiably questioned our commitment to finding a solution for this inequity.

Therefore, I take this opportunity to not only support the efforts of our colleague from Arizona, but to also reaffirm my resolve in seeing that the Congress finds an equitable solution to the notch problem, which is, in effect, unfair discrimination against a select group of citizens simply because of their birthdate.

When the 1977 Social Security measure was passed, a year before I was elected to the Senate, a new formula was implemented for calculating benefits dispensed under the program. In order to protect Social Security benefits for people already retired or soon to reach retirement age, a transitional period was established, causing the notch baby problem that we now have.

When Congress changed the Social Security formula, it intended to prevent the overpayment of benefits to some recipients. I do not believe that it was the intent of Congress in passing the 1977 Social Security amendments to create a situation whereby persons born between 1917 and 1921 would be penalized for working beyond the age of 62, particularly inasmuch as the difference in benefits is, as a general rule, greater for those who delay retirement beyond that age.

In practice, it was soon realized that this new formula created as much as a $100 per month disparity between benefits paid to one person born December 31, 1916, and another born January 1, 1917—only 1 day apart—even if they worked on the same job side-by-side, earning the same amount of money, for the same length of time. This disparity, which exists for all those who were born in the so-called notch years between 1917 and 1921, is not fair. Obviously, this comes out to approximately a significant $1,200 difference in Social Security paid for those workers over the course of a year.

I intend to continue doing what I can to correct this obvious discrimination. Almost everyone has a parent, friend, or acquaintance who was born between those years and is subject to this gross inequity. Incredibly, my State of Alabama, as of the end of 1990, had over 98,000 retired beneficiaries born during the notch years. We cannot sit back and allow a computer formula to randomly strip the benefits of these people who have worked so hard for so long.

Therefore, it is imperative that we amend the formula to close the benefit disparity which, understandably, has caused widespread concern among citizens around the country. The disadvantage to those who continue to work after age 65 especially must be resolved. The Social Security system was established to provide supplemental income and piece of mind to our retired citizens. Older Americans who have devoted considerable energy to their careers deserve a fair and reasonable return from the Social Security system on the money they have invested.

I urge each Member of the U.S. Congress to join in correcting this inequity in the Social Security system. We were elected to this body to represent the interests of our constituents. Our elderly and retired citizens deserve to be represented by responsible leaders. It is time for the U.S. Congress to commit itself to providing justice for these citizens. Action on this issue has been delayed for far too long already. As the saying goes, "justice delayed is justice denied."

S. 174. A bill to end certain cold war practices; to the Select Committee on Intelligence.

END OF COLD WAR PRACTICES ACT

• Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to offer legislation to end two cold war practices which are inconsistent with the best American traditions: Excluding aliens on the basis of their statements and beliefs and the failure of the Federal Government to publish the figure for all intelligence expenditures.

We have made great strides toward removing the cold war authority to exclude persons from the United States based on their beliefs. My legislation would strengthen our previous efforts and make it unambiguously clear that no person should be excluded from the United States due to their beliefs.

My legislation also requires the publication of a single figure for all funds spent on intelligence activities. This is a requirement of the Constitution, Mr. President, which we have neglected because of the cold war and should neglect no longer.

Mr. President, I send my legislation to the desk and ask for unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 174

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

TITLE I—RESTRICTION ON IDEOLOGICAL RESTRICTIONS

SEC. 101. FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(a) During the Cold War the United States excluded from entry into the United States persons with allegedly "unacceptable" opinions;

(b) Such exclusions are inconsistent with the fundamental American principles of free speech and the competition of ideas.

SEC. 102. REPEAL OF IDEOLOGICAL EXCLUSION AUTHORITY.—Subsection (c) of United States Code, Title 8, Section 1182 is amended to read—

"(i) IN GENERAL.—An alien whose entry or proposed activities in the United States the Secretary of State has reasonable ground to believe would have a serious adverse foreign policy consequences for the United States is excludable.

"(ii) EXCEPTION.—An alien shall not be excludable or subject to restrictions or conditions on entry into the United States under clause (i) because of the alien's past, current, or expected beliefs, statements, or associations, if such beliefs, statements, or associations would be lawful within the United States."

SEC. 103. Nothing in this title requires the admission of any alien believed to be a national security threat to the United States.

TITLE II—PUBLICATION OF TOTAL INTELLIGENCE EXPENDITURES

SEC. 201. FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) Article I, Section 9, Clause 7 of the United States Constitution states that "No Money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by law; and a regular Statement and Account of the Receipts and Expenditures of all public Money shall be published from time to time."

(2) During the Cold War the United States did not provide to the American people a "regular Statement and Account of the  Expenditures" for intelligence activities.

(3) The failure to provide to the American people a statement of the total amount of expenditures on intelligence activities prevents them from participating in an informed, democratic decision concerning the appropriate level for such expenditures.

SEC. 202. Section 1105(a) of Title 31 of the United States Code is amended to add at the end thereof—"(27) a separate, unclassified statement of the aggregate amount of budget outlays for the prior fiscal year for national and tactical intelligence activities. This figure shall include, without limitation, outlays for activities carried out under the Department of Defense budget to collect, analyze, produce, disseminate or support the collection of intelligence."*

S. 175. A bill to amend the Child Nutrition Act of 1966 to make the special supplemental food program for women, infants, and children [WIC] an entitlement program, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

WIC ENTITLEMENT PROGRAM ACT OF 1993

• Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, for the last several years my friend from Rhode Island, Senator CHAFEE, and I have led the efforts in the Senate to increase appropriations for the special supplemental food program for women, infants, and children [WIC]. As my colleagues will recall, our effort last year sought to increase WIC funding by $400 million over the prior year's current services level in order to maintain on schedule for full funding of WIC by 1995. Despite a record number of co-sponsors for our annual WIC appropriations initiative, the enacted appropriations level for the fiscal year 1992 for WIC was a full $160 million short of the target. It is very hard to imagine a consensus in this body on a discretionary program, but it is even harder to imagine that such a consensus could be formed and fail to achieve its goal.

Mr. President, I do not find fault in any way with the conferees on the fiscal year 1993 Agriculture appropriations bill. Their task was near impossible given an insufficient subcommittee allocation to meet all the demands upon them, especially in light of continued problems related to crop disaster insurance. I sincerely applaud the efforts of acting subcommittee chair, Senator BUMPERS, and ranking member, Senator COCHRAN, last year—both have consistently done whatever they could on behalf of WIC and last year's effort was no exception.

Mr. President, the reason our efforts to date have failed to keep pace with the WIC full funding schedule by 1995 are many, the most important of which are that the number of new poor at nutritional risk are growing faster than our ability to serve them. Hence, Senator DASCHLE and I are again calling for WIC to be permanently funded as an entitlement in fiscal year 1996 to assure that our Nation's needy children have a fighting chance to live, learn in school, and reach their full potential.

WIC provides critical nutrition and health benefits to over 4.7 million low-income pregnant women and young children at risk of diet-related health problems, but almost as many other needy women and children are unserved. Tragically, America ranks 19th in the world in infant mortality. Every year 40,000 infants die in the United States and another 11,000 babies are born with long-term disabilities that result from their weakened condition. Unless we act—and act soon—to provide full funding for WIC, we will lose more American infants in the next 13 years than we have lost soldiers in all the wars fought by this country in this century.

WIC is a Government program that works and I have been a leading advocate for this program since its inception because it is the right thing to do. WIC not only prevents infant mortality and low-birthweight, study after study has shown WIC is the most cost-effective method to do so. WIC reduces Medicaid costs: each dollar invested in WIC's prenatal component saved between $1.77 and $3.13 in Medicaid costs. In addition, studies show that future special education costs are reduced through WIC's early nutrition intervention.

There is room to improve though. WIC has not come close to fulfilling its potential. Current funding levels support about 60 percent of the eligible women, infants, and children nationwide. Arizona currently receives funding that enables the WIC Program to assist approximately 60 percent of those eligible throughout the State, but serves only 40 percent of those eligible in the urban areas. Nationwide, WIC isn't doing any better—nearly 60 percent of all women, and just over 40 percent of children eligible for the program. The bipartisan National Commission on Children's report says that the Federal Government isn't investing enough in WIC and recommends WIC be expanded to serve all 8.6 million financially needy pregnant and nursing women, and infants and children at nutritional risk. To do so will require increased annual funding of approximately $1.15 billion, or 44 percent more than the $2.6 billion appropriated for fiscal year 1992.

The reality is that we are never going to serve all the people who are eligible by 1995 if we proceed on the current track. We have to get beyond the way money is currently budgeted.

WIC funding tripled during the 1980's—faster than any other nondefense, domestic program. However, rising poverty rates have all but wiped out the earnest efforts which several of my colleagues and I have made. In 1990 alone, the number of children in poverty in America rose over 840,000 to 13.5 million children, many of whom are nutritionally at risk. That is why WIC needs permanent funding.

Many child nutrition advocates have not agreed with me about setting up an entitlement for WIC. They fear that other Government programs, including other child health and nutrition programs, will unduly suffer from rapid expansion of WIC. If that were true, I would not embark upon this effort. The reality is that WIC can be transformed into an entitlement with barely more than the short- and long-term savings it will produce. We need only to reform the Federal budget process to allow WIC to be able to recoup the savings it creates for Medicare as well as other Federal health care and education programs.

Mr. President, some other funds would be needed to fund WIC until the savings are realized, but these early outlays are insignificant in relation to the long-term savings. Even if the money was deducted out of the defense budget, it still would amount to only a fraction of their expenditures. The cost of infant mortality is borne by all of American society. The lifetime costs of caring for just one low-birthweight infant can total $400,000. The cost of prenatal care—care that might prevent the low birthweight condition in the first place—can be as little as $400. As a nation we have a choice. We can pay now, or we can pay much more later.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 175

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SPECIAL SUPPLEMENTAL FOOD PROGRAM.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 17(c)(1) of the Child Nutrition Act of 1966 (42 U.S.C. 1786(c)(1)) is amended—

(1) in the first sentence, by striking "may" and inserting "shall"; and

(2) by inserting after the first sentence the following new sentence: "Subject to the other provisions of this section, an eligible individual shall be entitled to receive the full amount of benefits authorized under this section."

(b) APPROPRIATION.—Section 17(g)(1) of such Act (42 U.S.C. 1786(g)(1)) is amended by striking the first sentence and inserting the following new sentences: "For purposes of providing benefits to all eligible individuals in the program and otherwise carrying out this section, there are authorized to be appropriated, and there are appropriated, to carry out this section such sums as are necessary for fiscal year 1994 and each succeeding fiscal year. The Secretary shall make available the sums described in the previous sentence to carry out this section."

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall become effective on October 1, 1993.■

By Mr. DOLE (for himself, Mr. MCCAIN, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. CRAIG, Mr. NICKLES, Mr. JEFFORDS, Mr. BOND, Mr. PACKWOOD, Mr. BURNS, Mr. MCCONNELL, Mr. WALLOP, Mr. SHELBY, Mr. BOREN, and Mr. BAUCUS):

S. 176. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act with respect to essential access community hospitals, the rural transition grant program, regional referral centers, Medicare-dependent small rural hospitals, interpretation of electrocardiograms, payment for new physicians and practitioners, prohibitions on carrier forum shopping, treatment of nebulizers and aspirators, and rural hospital demonstrations; to the Committee on Finance.

MEDICARE AMENDMENTS OF 1993

Mr. DOLE, Mr. President, these days the topic of health care reform is dominating many of our political debates—a topic that also dominated much of our recent campaign rhetoric. Just about everyone is running around talking about expanding access to health care in the United States. I, too, share in this concern, as I have throughout my career in public life. But, today, Mr. President, I am introducing a bill, which has bipartisan support, whose primary intention is not the expansion of health care, but instead the preservation of health care in rural areas.

Mr. President, as many newcomers become acquainted with the topic of health care reform, many Americans await action by their Government officials to do something before health care becomes a privilege enjoyed only by a few. This is perhaps nowhere more true than in rural areas.

The legislation I am introducing today would make minor and technical changes in title 18 of the Social Security Act to improve the operation of the Medicare Program. These provisions were included in H.R. 11, the Revenue Act of 1992, which was passed by both the House and Senate on October 5, 1992, but later vetoed.

Mr. President, in addition to preserving access to health care in rural areas, the provisions in the bill I am introducing today have a time sensitive quality in that without rapid action on the part of Congress, many of these provisions will expire. In some cases they already have done so. Many of these provisions have allowed rural hospitals to provide outreach services to rural populations and have enabled rural areas to continue to offer vital diagnostic, medical, and surgical facilities and services to the residents of these communities.

Mr. President, if because of congressional inaction, these provisions expire, many rural areas will be forced to reconsider the degree and level of services offered to area residents. In some cases, hospitals may have to close their doors altogether. Citizens in these areas would be forced to travel great distances to obtain critical health care services or be compelled to sacrifice health care entirely in some instances. Traveling may represent a significant hardship for our elderly and disabled populations and their families. Furthermore, to create a situation where individuals must forego services is, frankly, poor health policy.

The bill includes a number of provisions pertaining to hospital and physician payments:

Extends the Medicare dependent hospital provision for 3 full years and then is phased down until such time as the urban-rural differential expires.

The Rural Transition Grant Program would be reauthorized for an additional 3 years.

Extends the regional referral center provision until September 30, 1994.

The number of States authorized to participate in the Essential Access Community Hospital Program would be increased from seven to nine.

Repeals provisions that reduced the Medicare payment for new physicians during their first 4 years of practice.

Restores payment to physicians for EKG interpretations.

Mr. President, the cost associated with EKG interpretations and new physicians would be funded by reducing payments for all other physician services. Both provisions have the support of physician groups, including the American Medical Association.

In addition, the bill includes two provisions from H.R. 11 that passed both the House and Senate, which will result in revenue savings, thereby offsetting the costs of other provisions. One of these involves a change in Medicare reimbursement for nebulizers and aspirators. These two forms of equipment would be removed from the category of DME items or purchase amounts for such items would be established. Separate payments would be made for accessories used in conjunction with nebulizers and aspirators.

The other provision which results in revenue savings is a prohibition against carrier forum shopping. This provision would result in one carrier for one or more entire regions to process all claims within that region.

Mr. President, this is important legislation to the preservation of health care services in rural areas. It is budget neutral and has the support of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle. My hope is that Congress will not delay and enact this legislation on a timely basis.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleague, Senator DOLE, in today introducing legislation vital to ensuring access to care in our State, Kansas, and across rural America. While we in Congress work to enact comprehensive health care reform for all Americans, urban and rural, we must keep in place those programs and policies which bridge gaps and weaknesses in our current system.

The legislation we are introducing today will help to ensure that rural Americans continue to have access to high-quality, affordable, community-based care.

First, the legislation extends the Medicare Dependent Rural Hospital Program through October 1, 1994. I was an early cosponsor and supporter of this extension in the last Congress and will press hard for its timely enactment by this Congress.

The Medicare Dependent Rural Hospital Program is designed to ease the fiscal burden of rural hospitals with an exceptionally high proportion of Medicare patients. Kansas has 55 Medicare dependent hospitals, second in number only to Texas. The failure to extend this program would mean a loss of $8.6 million in improved Medicare payments to struggling Kansas hospitals.

Second, the measure extends the regional referral center status of currently qualified rural hospitals. Regional referral centers, of which Kansas has five, are large rural hospitals which provide more intensive and specialized care than is typical in smaller rural hospitals and therefore receive higher Medicare payment rates.

Third, the legislation extends and expands the Rural Health Transition Grant Program and the Essential Access Community Hospital Pilot Program. These two programs provide incentives to rural hospitals and communities to develop networks of care and focus on unmet health care needs. Last year, hospitals in six Kansas communities competed successfully for rural health transition grants. Kansas was also one of 7 States chosen to participate in the Essential Access Community Hospital Program, and we now have 10 care networks in the State.

Finally, the legislation repeals provisions that reduce Medicare payments for new physicians during their first 4 years of practice and eliminated separate reimbursement for interpreting electrocardiograms. Since parity in rural and urban physician payments is still being phased in, these provisions of current law have a particularly hard impact on rural physicians.

The enactment of these modest but vital provisions will help to maintain access to care in underserved areas of rural America while Congress develops a comprehensive health care plan for all Americans.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, there is no single issue that unites the concern of rural Americans more than access to quality health care. Unfortunately, no one piece of legislation will solve all the serious problems facing hospitals in rural areas. It is one of the crucial components of rural quality of life, which keeps and attracts people to small towns. A major obstacle is the financial squeeze faced by many rural hospitals and physicians because the reimbursements from Medicaid and Medicare are often much less than the cost of the specific medical procedures. These inequities are what I have been working to resolve during my years in the Senate.

Approximately 27 percent of the Nation's population lives in rural America. However, the rural population is disproportionately poor, experiences significantly higher rates of chronic illness and disability and is aging at a faster rate than the Nation as a whole. In rural areas, the elderly accounted for 13.8 percent of the population, but 22.5 percent of all physician visits.

The prospective payment system implemented by Medicare in 1983 has had a negative effect on many rural hospitals. Payments to hospitals for their Medicare patients have been subject to a variety of adjustments, including a geographic adjustment which reimburses rural hospitals at a lower rate than urban hospitals. A recent CBO report concludes that payments to rural hospitals have been much lower, relative to their costs, than payments to urban hospitals. And there is a constant threat of closure of rural hospitals, clinics, and other rural health care providers. Since 1986, 14 rural hospitals have closed in Minnesota and another 8 are identified as high financial risk institutions.

In 1986, we succeeded in reducing the unfair Medicare payment differential between urban and rural hospitals by 20 percent. And, in 1987 we were able to realize an increase in Medicare payment rates for rural hospitals which was two to three times as great as the increase for urban hospitals.

Today, I am pleased to join the distinguished Republican leader as an original cosponsor of legislation to address the needs of rural hospitals and correct problems in the OBRA '90 legislation which created inequities in EKG and new physicians Medicare reimbursement. Mr. President, each provision included in this legislation passed both bodies of Congress last year. Yet, they failed to become law because they were engulfed by the urban aid package which was ultimately vetoed.

Many of these Medicare provisions have been brought up through grassroots because they deeply affect rural States. In 1986, while visiting with staff from the Eveleth Hospital, in northern Minnesota, an idea was born that was translated into legislation. The Eveleth staff proposed that the Federal Government provide grants to small rural hospitals to help assure access to high-quality health care in communities that are attempting to cope with upheaval on many levels. Many of my colleagues joined me in this concept to introduce the Rural Health Services Transition Act of 1987, which provides grants of up to $50,000 per year to smaller rural hospitals to help them diversify and add new services.

There is no reason that facilities which we have known as hospitals can't expand and diversify into these new areas as they reduce or phase out other services. But, making this kind of transition is more difficult for smaller, rural hospitals because they may lack the time, resources, or staff expertise needed to assess community needs, and plan, implement, and market new services. The purpose of this legislation was to provide smaller rural hospitals with seed money to begin the transition to a more diverse health service center which can continue to provide essential emergency and other services which its community now depends on.

As a result, rural health transition grants have helped numerous rural hospitals. Last year, 12 Minnesota hospitals were awarded up to $50,000 over 3 years. Kanabec Hospital in Mora, MN, is working on shifting its focus to provide more outpatient services. Hendricks Community Hospital, in western Minnesota is putting their money toward a renovation project, coordinating additional services between hospital and elderly care programs.

Second, this legislation extends the rural referral center classification. On October 1, hospitals in rural areas meeting certain criteria lost their classification as regional referral centers. In Minnesota, rural hospitals are already experiencing a decline in reimbursement as their classification is re-evaluated. For instance, Rice Hospital in Willmar, MN, receives $139.13 less per discharge from Medicare. Rural hospitals already face many financial impediments. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to work quickly to pass this legislation before inaction generates irreversible consequences on our rural hospitals.

Mr. President, this legislation provides for the continuation of special payments for small rural hospitals qualifying as Medicare dependent hospitals [MDH's]. MDH status is beneficial to 11 Minnesota rural hospitals. Another 21 hospitals are eligible. Specifically, this provision would be very helpful for the Swift County-Benson Hospital in Benson, MN. This provision is beneficial because this 31-bed hospital's 1982 or 1987 costs are greater than the prospective payment rate.

Also, this bill addresses the Essential Access Community Hospital [EACH] Demonstration Program created in OBRA '89. Currently, there are seven States authorized to participate in the

EACH Program. One aspect of this legislation would increase the number of States eligible for grants under the program to nine. The Riverview Healthcare Association in Crookston, MN, and the center for rural health at the University of North Dakota work together to provide an integrated rural health network. Therefore, it is my hope that this provision will open the EACH Program to North Dakota.

In addition, this bill moves toward correcting an inequity in the Medicare Program that reduces rates for new physicians. This has a severe impact on group practices. Both the Mayo Clinic and Park Nicollet in Minnesota have been impacted by such reductions. Group practices were exempt from the so-called new physicians reduction prior to OBRA '90. However, under current law, an established physician can be treated as a new physician if one never independently submitted claims for services provided to Medicare beneficiaries. This practice ignores the purpose of physician payment reform in which Medicare reimbursement is based on a resource-based relative value scale.

Lastly, Mr. President, I am pleased that this legislation includes a provision that I introduced separately last year. OBRA '90 prohibited separate payment for the interpretation of EKG's that are performed or ordered to be performed as part of a visit to a physician. This resulted in inequities. Therefore, over the past 2 years, I have sponsored legislation to reestablish separate payment for EKG interpretation.

Because HCFA was prohibited from establishing separate payment for EKG interpretation in the Medicare fee schedule, it increased the reimbursement for office visits and consultations. In other words, it bundled EKG reimbursement into the visit and consultation billing codes. However, in this case, the provision redistributes moneys to physicians who never interpret EKG's and does not sufficiently pay physicians who interpret many EKG's. Because the use of EKG's varies widely by specialty, it is not currently possible to construct a bundled fee for office visits that, on average, would balance out fairly over time.

We have created a financial disincentive which may discourage physicians from interpreting EKG's. We have to make a change in the fee schedule to eliminate this false economy and deliver the quality care Medicare patients deserve.

This bill is no silver bullet which will save all rural hospitals. Nor will it correct every inequity in the Medicare fee schedule. But, this bill is a strong forward step in assisting rural hospitals to become stronger health service institutions. This bill sends a strong message to rural America: Washington cares about your problems and wants to help ensure access to quality health care.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. DOLE (for himself, Mr. CRAIG, Mr. WALLOP, Mr. GRAMM, Mr. SIMPSON, Mr. HELMS, Mr. NICKLES, Mr. BOND, Mr. MCCONNELL, Mr. STEVENS, and Mr. LOTT):

S. 177. A bill to ensure that agencies establish the appropriate procedures for assessing whether or not regulation may result in the taking of private property, so as to avoid such where possible; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

PRIVATE PROPERTY RIGHTS ACT

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, it is an honor for me to have been asked by our very distinguished former colleague, Steve Symms of Idaho, to introduce a bill he sponsored in 1991, the Private Property Rights Act.

One might reasonably ask why, in a nation in which the rights of property owners are supposed to be protected from the Federal Government under the fifth amendment to our Constitution, and from State governments by the 14th amendment, would we need a law protecting private property? The reason is, unfortunately, those working in government, those who have sworn to uphold our Constitution, are not always as vigilant as they need to be.

There are literally billions of dollars in claims filed against the Federal Government by landowners who believe their private property has been taken by the Government without just compensation, as is required by the Constitution. It is important to note that a taking can occur even though title to the property remains with the original owner and the Government has only placed restrictions on its use.

Fortunately, courts have recognized these partial takings are subject to just compensation. Unfortunately, the only check on the enforcement of the Constitution has been through the court system, wherein citizens can, at the expense of vast amounts of money and time, ensure the Government complies with the Constitution. Were it not so tragic, it might be amusing—we are forcing our citizens to spend their time, their money, to ensure those who are sworn to uphold the Constitution—Government employees—actually do so.

President Ronald Reagan recognized this failure of the system and, on March 15, 1988, issued Executive Order 12630 which, in effect, required Federal agencies to review regulations before they were issued to determine whether takings of private property could occur thereunder. The order also established a set of principles based on the age-old law of man that private property ownership is sacred and should be defended. The order told the agencies not to take private property—in whole or in part—unless absolutely necessary.

The bill I am introducing today would accomplish two goals: First, the Executive order would become law, and second, would require all Federal departments and agencies to comply. Simple goals really, we are asking the Government to uphold the Constitution—we are asking those who have sworn to uphold our precious Bill of Rights to do so, we are telling the citizens, the taxpayers, the landowners that finally we will do our job, and they can rest assured they will not spend their time, their money to ensure we do our job.

Mr. President, I ask my colleagues to talk with their small business men and women, their farmers, their ranchers, those who believe in the private property rights contained in our Constitution, what they think about this most appropriate legislation. After doing so, I am certain we can move this legislation early in this Congress.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill and additional material be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 177

SEC. 4. JUDICIAL REVIEW.

(a) Judicial review of actions taken pursuant to this Act shall be limited to whether the Attorney General has certified the issuing agency as in compliance with Executive Order 12630 or similar procedures, such review to be permitted in the same forum and at the same time as the issued regulations are otherwise subject to judicial review. Only persons adversely affected or grieved by agency action shall have standing to challenge that action as contrary to this Act. In no event shall such review include any issue for which the United States Claims Court has jurisdiction.

(b) Nothing in this section shall affect any otherwise available judicial review of agency action.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I am very pleased to join the Republican leader Senator DOLE and Senator BOREN in the sponsorship of a critical piece of bipartisan legislation, the Private Property Rights Act of 1993. This bill will codify Executive Order No. 12630, the takings order, signed by President Reagan in 1988 to protect fifth amendment private property rights which include ownership, use, and transfer of private property of all types. The fifth amendment clearly states " * * * nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation."

A taking can occur when Government action does not invoke the condemnation power yet infringes on private property rights. This legislation's key provision declares that no Federal regulation can take effect until the potential for taking private property has been assessed. It gives muscle to the executive order's demand that agencies adopt supplemental guidelines for assessing the taking implication of their actions.

The passage of this legislation will continue to safeguard property owners—it is most critical to the residents of my State of Wyoming, where the Federal Government holds half of all lands, and other western States where the Government owns even more.

Acreage of Federal lands expanded by cessions and purchase are concentrated in the American West and dramatically diminish the West's control over its own destiny. As a result, the West is less whole and has more limited opportunities than those States with only occasional Federal lands. The Federal Government has managed to become the de facto manager of all the lands, public and private, and controls them by rules and regulations that are often unwise and ill-advised. This is where takings becomes important.

Those who render preservationist agendas for the western States by law and regulations have little at stake. If they prevail, the healthy, productive West will be stripped of the very qualities that draw people to it today. This Senator strongly opposes the preservationists' agenda, and my position relies on the text of the Constitution.

The basic element at issue on the Federal lands is production—do we or do we not support production on our Federal lands? The other values such as recreation and wildlife are benefits which result from healthy, productive lands. When Government actions suppress viable production, the Nation must import what we are regulated from producing. Jobs are lost, economies are wrecked, and America's ability to compete internationally is impaired. This is ludicrous. If our ranchers and farmers are unable to make a living from the land, their capital investments will disappear. Then the public will have to dig deep into its pockets in order to rebuild the infrastructure. At a time when the primary concern is deficit reduction, we cannot tolerate actions that reduce the balance of payments on one-third of our Nation's land.

The West, not unlike other regions of the country, has unique concerns. It has long been a goal of this Senator to foster a better understanding of the western lifestyle and its related problems which this Congress must address. The West is populated with savvy, well-educated, and creative stewards. These are the people who have invested their lives and their incomes in the land. They work at maintaining partnerships with the Federal Government at local levels as both they and Federal land managers strive to balance the differing opinions and competing values. These efforts are increasingly thwarted by the 29-cent appeal and other obstacles orchestrated by some environmental groups who are totally disinterested in balance or solutions. Millions of taxpayer dollars are spent by the bureaucracy to ward off a feel-good management system. Rules and regulations touted as protecting and enhancing the environment most often strangle the economic vitality of communities. They put at risk not only western jobs and the environment, but the economic health and the food supply of this Nation as well.

The Framers of the Constitution saw the need to protect private property from a hungry Federal Government. The U.S. Congress enacted the principles of multiple-use and sustained yield to protect western heritage, production, cultures, and economies from those who would mistakenly turn the land into a playground for urban sprawl. It is ironic that one need only look at the wave of development creeping from the highly populated cities of the West to understand that there is not a more sustainable use and protector of open space than farmers and ranchers.

As we begin this 103d Congress, I invite my colleagues and their staffs to join those of us in the West for an on-the-ground tour of our intermingled Federal lands. I invite you to come view the vastness and complexities of our land, learn about wildlife migration routes, and see how the private sector keeps the wildlife numbers growing: See too where the water flows and how that pattern affects access and grazing issues, and yes, understand how a grizzly bear can control riparian areas and how elk, deer, antelope, and wild horses determine land use.

The mosaic of the West is complex and interdependent. What seems to be is not always the case and wise decisions cannot be made without understanding the whole. This information is not found in slick magazines or in Government studies. Stewardship and protection of the environment go hand in hand. There is a tremendous opportunity in the West to nurture a sustainable and traditional way of life while, at the same time, protecting the environment and providing the recreational experiences the Nation demands.

Mr. President, passage of the Private Property Act of 1993 will provide for better government and better business. As this legislation moves from committee to the Senate and House floor, I urge my colleagues to weigh the matter carefully—study it—and approve this protection for all of our fifth amendment rights.

By Mr. MOYNIHAN:

S. 178. A bill to amend chapter 44 of title 18, United States Code, to prohibit the manufacture, transfer, or importation of .25 caliber and .32 caliber and 9 millimeter ammunition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 179. A bill to tax 9 millimeter, .25 caliber, and .32 caliber bullets; to the Committee on Finance.

TAXATION AND RESTRICTIONS ON CERTAIN AMMUNITION

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to introduce two bills—the Violent Crime Prevention Act and the Real Cost of Ammunition Act. Their purposes are to ban or tax those calibers of ammunition used disproportionately in crime. These bills represent new approaches for protecting U.S. citizens from gun violence. I introduced these provisions, as S. 51 and as title II of S. 3373, in the last Congress to ban or tax crime rounds. There is a real need for these provisions to account for the true costs of bullets. Look at the data.

In 1989, 34,776 people lost their lives in the United States from bullets, 14,464 were murdered, 18,178 committed suicide, the rest died from accidents or legal intervention—shot by a policeman or such. Although no national statistics are kept on bullet-related injuries, studies suggest they are from 2 to 5 times more frequent than deaths; up to 175,000 bullet injuries per year.

Homicide is the second leading cause of death in the 15- to 34-year-old age bracket, surpassed only by unintentional events like automobile crashes. It is the leading cause of death for black males aged 15 to 34. The lifetime risk of death from homicide in U.S. males is 1 in 164, about the same as the risk of battle death faced by U.S. servicemen from all forces serving in Vietnam. For black males the lifetime risk of death from homicide is 1 in 28, twice the risk of battle death faced by marines serving in Vietnam. Almost all homicides are caused by bullets.

Consider, in 1989 a total of 17,277 black males in the 15- to 34-year age group died in the United States. Homicides accounted for 6,031 of the total deaths; 4,804 were murdered by bullets or 80 percent. That same year a total of 52,148 white males in the 15- to 34-year age group died in the United States. Of these, homicide accounted for 4,464 of the total deaths among these young white males; 3,126 were killed by bullets, over 75 percent. For black males it is pure carnage; 10 times the white rate.

As noted by Susan Baker and her colleagues in the book "Epidemiology and Health Policy" edited by Sol Levine and Abraham Lilienfeld:

There is a correlation between rates of private ownership of guns and gun-related death rates;

Guns cause two-thirds of family homicides; and Small easily concealed weapons comprise the majority of guns used for homicides, suicides and unintentional death.

Baker states that— these facets of the epidemiology of firearm-related deaths and injuries have important implications. Combined with their lethality, the widespread availability of easily concealed handguns for impetuous use by people who are angry, drunk, or frightened appears to be a major determinant of the high firearm death rate in the United States. Each contributing factor has implications for prevention. Unfortunately, issues related to gun control have evoked such strong sentiments that epidemiologic data are rarely employed to good advantage (emphasis added).

Certainly, the strong sentiments about gun control have made the subject difficult for the epidemiologists. But, it might also be they are looking at the wrong interaction. Couldn't we focus on the bullets and not the guns, avoid some of the strong sentiments and even save lives?

Let's look at our experience with controlling epidemics. Although the science of epidemiology traces its roots to antiquity—Hippocrates stressed the importance of considering environmental influences on human diseases—the first modern epidemiology study was conducted by James Lind in 1747. His efforts led to the eventual control of scurvy. It wasn't until 1795 that the British Navy accepted his analysis and required limes in shipboard diets. Most solutions are not perfect. Disease is rarely eliminated. But might epidemiology be applied in the case of bullets to reduce suffering? I think so.

In 1854 John Snow and William Farr collected data that clearly showed cholera was caused by contaminated drinking water. Snow removed the handle of the Broad Street pump in London to prevent people from drawing water from this contaminated water source and the disease stopped in this population. His observations led to a legislative mandate that all London water companies filter their water by 1857. Cholera epidemics subsided. Now treatment of sewage prevents cholera from entering our rivers and lakes, and disinfection of drinking water makes water distribution systems uninhabitable for cholera vibrio, identified by Robert Koch as the causative agent in 1883, 26 years after Snow's study.

In 1900, Walter Reed identified mosquitoes as the carriers of yellow fever. Subsequent, mosquito control efforts by another U.S. Army doctor, William Gorgas, enabled the United States to complete the Panama Canal. The French failed because their workers were too sick from yellow fever to work. Now that it is known that yellow fever is caused by a virus, vaccines are used to eliminate the spread of the disease.

These pioneering epidemiology success stories showed the world that epidemics require an interaction between three things: the host, the person who becomes sick or, in the case of bullets, the victim; the agent, the cause of sickness or the bullet; and the environment, the setting in which the sickness occurs or in the case of bullets, violent behavior. Interrupt this epidemiological triad and you reduce or eliminate disease and injury.

How might this knowledge apply to the control of bullet-related injury and death? Again, we're talking about something different from gun control. There is a precedent. In the middle of this century it was recognized that epidemiology could be applied to automobile death and injury. From a governmental perspective, this hypothesis was first adopted in 1959, late in the administration of Gov. Averell Harriman in New York State. In the 1960 Presidential campaign I drafted a statement on the subject which was released by Senator John F. Kennedy as part of a general response to enquiries from the American Automobile Association. Then Senator Kennedy stated:

Traffic accidents constitute one of the greatest, perhaps the greatest of the nation's public health problems. They waste as much as 2 percent of our gross national product every year and bring endless suffering. The new highways will do much to control the rise of the traffic toll, but by themselves they will not reduce it. A great deal more investigation and research is needed. Some of this has already begun in connection with the highway program. It should be extended until highway safety research takes its place as an equal of the many similar programs of health research which the federal government supports.

Experience in the 1950's and early 1960's, prior to passage of the Motor Vehicle Safety Act, showed that traffic safety enforcement campaigns designed to change human behavior did not improve traffic safety. In fact the death and injury toll mounted. I was Assistant Secretary of Labor in the mid-1960's when Congress was developing the Motor Vehicle Safety Act, and I was called to testify.

It was clear to me and others that motor vehicle injuries and deaths could not be limited by regulating driver behavior. Nonetheless, we had an epidemic on our hands and we needed to do something about it. My friend William Haddon, the first Administrator of the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, recognized that automobile fatalities were caused by a second collision. In the first collision the automobile strikes some object. When energy is transferred to the interior of the car, a second collision occurs as the driver and occupants strike the steering wheel, dashboard, and other structures in the passenger compartment. The second collision is the agent of injury to the host, the car's occupant. Efforts to make automobiles crashworthy follow examples used to control infectious disease epidemics. Reduce or eliminate the agent of injury. Seat belts, padded dashboards, and air bags are all specifically designed to reduce, if not eliminate, injury caused by the agent of automobile injuries, energy transfer to the human body during the second collision. In fact, we've done nothing revolutionary. All of the technology used to date to make cars crashworthy, including air bags, was developed prior to 1970.

Experience shows the approach worked. Sure it could have worked better, but it worked. Had we been able to totally eliminate the agent, the second collision, the cure would have been complete. Nonetheless, by just focusing on simple, achievable remedies we reduced the traffic death and injury epidemic by 30 percent. Let's look at the facts again. Motor vehicle deaths declined in absolute terms by 13 percent from 1980 to 1990 despite significant increases in the number of drivers, vehicles, and miles driven. Driver behavior is changing too. National seat belt usage is up dramatically, 60 percent now compared to 14 percent in 1984. These efforts have resulted in some 15,000 lives saved and 100,000 injuries avoided each year.

We can apply our experience to the epidemic of murder and injury from bullets. The environment in which these deaths and injuries occur is complex. Many factors likely contribute to the rise in bullet-related injury. Here is an important similarity with the situation we faced 25 years ago regarding automobile safety. We simply cannot do much to change the environment, violent behavior, in which gun-related injury occurs, nor do we know how. We can, however, do something about the agent causing the injury—bullets. Ban them! At least the rounds used disproportionately to cause death and injury; that is, .25 caliber, .32 caliber, and 9-millimeter bullets. These three rounds compose 13 percent of licensed guns in New York City, yet they are involved in one-third of all homicides. They aren't used for sport or hunting.

They are used for violence. On December 17, 1992, Patrick Daly, principal of Public School 15 in New York was shot and killed as he searched for a missing student in the crime ridden Red Hook housing project. The murder weapon—a 9-millimeter gun. Mr. President, if we fail to confront the fact that .25 caliber, .32 caliber, and 9-millimeter bullets are used disproportionately in crimes, innocent people like Patrick Daly will continue to die.

I have called on Congress during the past several sessions to ban these bullet calibers. If we do not succeed in banning them, then we ought, at least, to tax them heavily. This would not be the first time that Congress has banned a particular round of ammunition. In 1986, the same year this body passed the Firearms Owners Protection Act, it passed legislation banning the so-called cop-killer bullet. This round, jacketed with tungsten alloys, steel, brass, or any number of other metals, had been demonstrated to penetrate no fewer than four police flak jackets and an additional five Los Angeles County phone books at one time. In 1982, the New York Police Benevolent Association came to me and Representative Biaggi and asked us to do something about the ready availability of these bullets. The result was the Law Enforcement Officers Protection Act, which we introduced in 1982, 1983, and for the last time during the 99th Congress. In the end, with the tacit support of the National Rifle Association the measure passed the Congress and was signed by the President as Public Law 99-408 on August 28, 1986.

There are some 200 million firearms in circulation. The pistol is a simple machine, and with minimal care it remains working for centuries. However, we have only a 4-year supply of bullets. Some 2 billion cartridges are used each year. At any given time there are some 7.5 billion rounds in factory, commercial, or household inventory.

In all cases, except pistol whipping, gun-related injuries are not caused by the gun but by bullets, the agent involved in the second collision. As I've said before, would this end the problem of handgun killings? No. But it just might reduce it. A 30-percent reduction in bullet-related deaths, for instance, would save over 10,000 lives each year. And, prevent up to 50,000 wounds.

Water treatment efforts to reduce typhoid fever in the United States took about 60 years. Slow sand filters were installed in certain cities in the 1880's, and water chlorination treatment began in the 1910's. The death rate from typhoid in Albany, NY, prior to 1889 when the municipal water supply was treated by sand filtration was about 100 fatalities per 100,000 people per year. The rate dropped to about 25 typhoid deaths per year after 1889, and dropped again to about 10 typhoid deaths per year after 1915 when chlorination was introduced. By 1950, the death rate from typhoid fever had dropped to zero. It will likely take longer than 60 years to eliminate bullet-related death and injury, but we need to start with achievable measures to break the deadly interactions between people, bullets, and violent behavior.

The bills I introduce today begin the process. They begin to control the agent of disease, the bullet, through banning or taxing those rounds used disproportionately in crime—the .25-caliber, .32-caliber, and 9-millimeter rounds.

More importantly, they recognize the epidemic nature of the problem, building on the June 10, 1992 issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association which is devoted entirely to papers on the subject of violence, principally violence associated with firearms.

Mr. President, it is time to join the medics and control the epidemic of bullet-related violence. I urge my colleagues to support these bills and ask unanimous consent that their texts be printed in the RECORD in full.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. SPECTER:

S.J. Res. 4. A joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment to authorize the President to exercise a line-item veto over individual items of appropriation; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LINE-ITEM VETO CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, once again I introduce a proposed constitutional amendment to authorize the President to veto or reduce individual items of appropriation in bills and resolutions. The line-item veto or reduction authority is a necessary step in helping to bring the chronic budget deficit under control, and I have long supported it. This proposed authority of the President to veto or reduce specific items of appropriation in large spending bills provides a realistic opportunity to rein in the deficit from which we suffer.

I believe the President now has the constitutional authority to exercise the line-item veto, and I co-signed a letter authored by Senator DOLE urging President Bush to exercise the line-item veto, but President Bush declined on the advice of his counsel. This amendment would remove all doubt.

The budget process has run amok in recent years. Most recently, the outgoing administration provided information to indicate that the deficit will continue to balloon over the next 4 years, contradicting previous information regarding the growth of the deficit. And some commentators suggested that this recent report understates the scope of the problem. A line-item veto would provide a valuable institutional check on unfettered spending and trade-off pork-barrel projects that serve not the national interest but rather private interests and must therefore be buried in lengthy appropriations bills, out of sight of all but the concerned interest groups.

Currently, the President cannot realistically control this form of congressional excess. The choice is a stark one: either the President vetoes an entire appropriations bill, putting at risk all programs funded in the bill or he swallows the relatively small percentage of pork spending in any bill to fund the large number of vital programs. The line-item veto gives the President a useful tool with which to counter this type of wasteful spending. Standing alone, the line-item veto will not solve our deficit problem, but it will help by allowing the President to stop or reduce funding should he deem the programs too expensive or unnecessary.

I believe that it is preferable to grant to the President not only the authority to veto completely individual items of appropriation, but also to grant him enhanced rescission authority. Studies in States whose governors exercise line-item veto authority suggest that while a straight line-item veto, an up or down on a specific item of appropriation, have little effect on spending and budget deficits, enhanced rescission authority does have a significant effect on spending. Therefore, my proposal contains both a veto provision and a provision to allow the President to reduce individual items of appropriation.

Many claim that the line-item veto would result in an intolerable shift of power from the Congress to the Executive and undermine the carefully crafted balance of power established by the Founding Fathers. No one is more sensitive than I am to the respective roles of the legislature and the executive and the need to retain a balance of authority between the two branches. While it is a peculiarly legislative function to decide how much money to spend on Government programs and to allocate these funds, there is no reason for a line item veto to be considered any more of an infringement on the separation of powers than the President's ability to veto bills at all. The veto power serves a crucial function in our system. As Alexander Hamilton recognized in Federalist 73, the veto provides—

An additional security against the enactment of improper laws  to guard the community against the effects of faction, precipitancy, or of any impulse unfriendly to the public good, which may happen to influence a majority of [the legislative] body.

The purpose for enacting a line-item veto fits squarely within this reasoning.

Of course, under the Constitution, Congress controls the power of the purse. The ultimate authority of the Congress to decide how to allocate and spend the Federal Government's money is protected by my proposal. Under my proposed constitutional amendment, Congress could override the President's veto or reduction of any specific item of appropriation by a simple majority vote. This override by simple majority, rather than by the two-thirds majority needed to override a veto of an entire bill, provides adequate protection for congressional spending authority. Any item of appropriation that cannot command the support of either the President or a simple majority of the Congress is simply bad policy and should not be approved at all. By allowing a simple majority vote to override, the proposal allows Congress to exercise its authority consistent with the general constitutional requirement that a simple majority is sufficient to enact legislation. Thus, the line-item veto is not terribly onerous to congressional prerogatives. It merely requires Congress to take a second look at particular items of spending. In this regard, it forces the entire institution to look over spending. Thus, the line-item veto as I propose it, will merely reduce the power of congressional committees and special-interest group lobbyists; it will have no significant effect on the authority of the Congress as an institution.

Mr. President, the issue of the line-item veto has been pending for several years. In the 101st Congress, the Judiciary Committee favorably reported two different versions of the line-item veto amendment, although the full Senate never considered either proposal. In the 102d Congress, no proposal was reported, but proposed statutory enhanced rescission authority was considered and rejected twice by the Senate. I hope that this year, when the political pressure of divided government has been removed, is the year in which we finally enact this worthwhile idea.

As I have said, I do not believe that, on its own, a line-item veto will cure the deficit. Together with budget reforms, and greater Executive and congressional discipline, the line-item veto offers hope. Indeed, it is this hope that induces me to introduce this proposal again. While President Reagan and President Bush both supported a line-item veto, there was little realistic chance of its adoption with a Congress controlled by Democrats. With the accession of President Clinton, who has enjoyed constitutional authority to employ a line-item veto as Governor of Arkansas and strongly supports the line-item veto in principle, I expect and hope that a Federal line-item veto can finally become part of our fundamental law and can be used as a weapon against out-of-control budget deficits.

We must do something to curb these deficits. The American people have made it clear that they will not accept government as usual. We must put the public interest first and the private interests of the groups that come begging for federal dollars must no longer enter into our consideration. The best way to thwart the power of private interests is to shed light on them, and the line-item veto will enable the President and Congress to do just that.

I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 4

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein). That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution if ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years after its submission for ratification:

"ARTICLE —

"Section 1. The President may reduce or disapprove any item of appropriation in an Act or joint resolution. If an Act or joint resolution is approved by the President, any item of appropriation contained therein which is not reduced or disapproved shall become law.

"Section 2. The President shall return with his objections any item of appropriation reduced or disapproved to the House in which the Act or joint resolution containing such item originated.

"Section 3. The Congress may, in the manner prescribed under section 7 of Article I for acts disapproved by the President, reconsider any item reduced or disapproved under this article, except that only a majority of each House shall be required to approve an item which has been disapproved or to restore an item which has been reduced by the President to the original amount contained in the Act or joint resolution."

By Mr. SPECTER:

S.J. Res. 5. A joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment to require a Federal balanced budget; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BALANCED BUDGET CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, it has become commonplace for our Federal Government to run a budget deficit in every fiscal year. It has also become commonplace for Congress to consider a proposed balanced budget amendment every year. Somehow, we have no trouble garnering sufficient votes to enact these huge deficits. Thus far, however, we have been unable to put together sufficient votes to enact the balanced budget amendment. No wonder people believe the system does not work.

Congress has come close to passing a balanced budget amendment in the past. In the 97th Congress, the Senate did in fact pass such an amendment, but the House did not. In 1986, the Senate failed by one vote to pass a proposed balanced budget amendment. In the 101st Congress, the Judiciary Committee favorably reported a proposed balanced budget amendment by an 11-3 vote, but the full Senate never considered the issue. In the 102d Congress, the House came within nine votes of passing a proposed balanced budget amendment. This is not an issue that will go away, and I intend to continue to pursue it. To that end, I offer this proposed amendment to the Constitution to require a balanced budget.

The last year the Government operated at a surplus was 1969. Since then, the problem has gotten worse, culminating in the huge budget deficits of the past few years. In fiscal year 1989, the deficit was $152.5 billion. That figure ballooned to $290.2 billion for fiscal year 1992. For the current fiscal year, the Office of Management and Budget estimates that the deficit will exceed $327 billion. Recent estimates by both OMB and the Clinton transition team suggest that the deficit is only going to get worse. The national debt has soared to over $4 trillion.

This chronic deficit has an extremely deleterious effect on the economy. It sucks up capital that would otherwise be available for private investment to help the economy grow. The adverse effects of the deficit on the economy became a major campaign issue during the recent presidential election. Most recently, President Clinton's economic advisers have been hedging their bets about a stimulus package and a middle class tax cut promised by candidate Clinton because of the scope of the deficit.

I strongly believe that there is no domestic issue more important to our country in the long-term than this deficit. Given President Clinton's admiration for Thomas Jefferson, I suspect he agrees with the third President of the extreme danger of deficit spending to our republican form of government. No sharper arrow can be placed in a President's quiver to combat these chronic deficits than a balanced budget amendment. It places the sanction of our fundamental law on the need for a balance between receipts and expenditures. The President and all Members of Congress take an oath to uphold the Constitution. Requiring a balanced budget in the text of the Constitution as a legally enforceable provision will force us to curb deficit spending. As all parties in the political system have shown themselves to be unable to withstand the vicissitudes of the current political system, the answer is to change the system.

The Constitution delimits the powers of the respective branches of Government and defines the processes under which the separate branches exercise those powers. In so doing, the Constitution and the amendments to it reflect certain core values and principles and removes them from the vagaries of shifting political influences. Deficit spending puts at risk many of the balanced safeguards intended to limit factional government. It tends to make government a spoils system, a trough for feeding special interests, and little else. This threatens the republican nature of our Government as envisioned by Madison and other Framers. When the fundamental nature of our Government is at risk, a constitutional amendment is the only proper remedy. The balanced budget amendment reflects a necessary value designed to preserve the fundamental structural values reflected in the Constitution.

My proposed amendment would require the President to transmit a proposed balanced budget to Congress for its consideration. This requirement puts the initial onus on the President to propose a balanced budget. The amendment would prohibit deficit spending unless three-fifths of the whole number of both Houses of Congress provide for a specific excess of outlays over receipts. Thus, even though the amendment would permit deficit spending, it would do so only upon the approval of a super majority of both Houses, and even then the scope of the deficit would be limited to the amount specifically authorized by Congress. The provisions of the amendment could be waived by simple majority vote in any year in which a declaration of war is in effect.

Obviously, a constitutionally mandated balanced budget could require significant spending cuts and/or revenue increases. To require a balanced budget too soon would result in severe economic dislocation. Therefore, the amendment would not take effect until the third fiscal year after its ratification. In light of the period needed for ratification, I do not expect the provisions of this amendment to become operative for several years in addition to the three provided for, allowing sufficient time for the government to prepare for their application.

I have said before that political will is the best answer to the problem of our Nation's budget deficit. But we who are responsible for representing our constituents have focused on the deficit now for many years and have been unable to come up with a solution acceptable to a sufficient majority. Our political institutions have failed to resolve this problem. When an issue as fundamental to our Nation's well-being in the future as the deficit proves to be politically intractable, the answer must be to enshrine the value of balanced budget among the core values in our Constitution, to remove it from the vicissitudes of the political arena. That is what a balanced budget amendment would achieve. It is an idea whose time is overdue, and I hope that Congress will approve and send to the States for ratification a balanced budget amendment this year.

Mr. President, I ask for unanimous consent that a copy of my proposed joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

• Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I rise today to announce my cosponsorship of the balanced budget amendment to the Constitution. I do so out of a feeling of frustration at the willingness of our government to operate, year after year, in deficit. During the 1950's, the Federal deficit averaged less than 1 percent of GNP. By the 1970's the average was 2.3 percent. In the 1980's it doubled to 4.1 percent. Last year—fiscal year 1992—the deficit was expected to reach 6.3 percent of GNP. Our Government and our Nation are becoming addicted to running our Government in deficit.

Many say that endless deficits are not necessarily dangerous. As long as the percentage of GNP remains stable, the thinking is that the deficits are not always problematic. Yet, as the previous statistics demonstrate, the percentage of GNP is not stable. It is ever growing. In addition, the endless accumulation of annual deficits reduce long run growth because they consume private savings which would otherwise be used for investment. With a tax system already heavily biased against savings and in favor of consumption, we simply cannot afford to eat up the resources necessary for healthy, long-term investment. In addition, the growth of the national debt is responsible in part for the increase in public interest payments, growing from an average of 7.3 percent of Federal outlays in the 1950's to 13.8 percent in 1992. Payment on interest of course eats up possible resources which could be spent on other, more productive uses.

Thus, we need a huge red light. We need to be told to stop. Legislative fixes have failed us in this regard. We need something larger and more powerful than simply a statute. Thus, to me, this attempt to pass a constitutional amendment is symbolic. It is symbolic of our willingness to say that deficit reduction is an important issue. This amendment is certainly better than the status quo, where we seem addicted to the narcotic of spending more than we take in.

This Nation cherishes and takes seriously amendments to our Constitution. The willingness to pass an amendment of this sort will signal our seriousness in grabbing hold of this serious problem.

Yet, I must admit that I support the balanced budget amendment with one condition and with one observation. The condition is that it is my understanding that this amendment does not put the judicial branch of Government into the business of deciding levels of taxation or appropriations. It is fundamental to the tradition of this country that the courts not get into the legislative functions of taxing and spending. It is my understanding, and my staff has been told, that a section has been added to this amendment specifically to take care of this concern. Specifically, the amendment says, "The Congress shall enforce and implement this article by appropriate legislation." I must say that I wish that the amendment would say expressly on its face that nothing in the amendment empowers the courts to tax or spend. In cosponsoring this amendment, I want to reserve the right at the appropriate time to offer an amendment to say just that.

My observation is that this amendment does not give us the courage necessary to make the hard choices needed to balance the budget. This amendment states that the Constitution requires us to do so, but to implement that constitutional mandate, we in Congress must be willing to step up to the plate. Last June, I introduced a sense of the Senate resolution that called on the Presidential candidates to discuss the issue of deficit reduction and take it seriously. Thirty-two Members of the Senate opposed it because the resolution said the following: "The existing reckless Federal fiscal policy cannot be addressed in a meaningful way without including consideration of restraining entitlements and increasing taxes." This seems self-evident to me, yet even mention of the need for these steps causes politicians to quake in their boots.

Passage of this amendment will not automatically give the House and the Senate courage. We must provide that. But passage of this amendment will show the seriousness of this issue and the serious need to address it. We will have a constitutional responsibility to deal with it.

One issue I have not yet resolved is whether there is a need for more flexibility in applying this amendment; I mean just that. I do not mean to hamstring the Federal Government for necessary expenditures in extraordinary times. Accordingly, I will continue to review, and ask my staff to prepare, provisions that will allow government to respond to business cycles and operating emergencies within the context of the amendment. But, I do believe that these exceptions must be narrowly drawn, and if we choose to exercise this flexibility, we must vote for it explicitly in the face of a mandate to achieve a balanced budget.

With those conditions and observations, I proudly join as a cosponsor of this constitutional amendment.●

By Mr. THURMOND (for himself, Mr. DECONCINI, and Mr. SIMPSON):

S.J. Res. 8. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution relating to a Federal balanced budget; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BALANCED BUDGET CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation to amend the U.S. Constitution to require the Federal Government to achieve and maintain a balanced budget.

This legislation is essentially the same as Senate Joint Resolution 9 which I introduced in the 102d Congress and is similar to an earlier bill in March 1986 which received 66 of 67 votes needed for Senate approval. Simply stated, this legislation calls for a Constitutional amendment requiring that outlays not exceed receipts during any fiscal year. Also, the Congress would be allowed by three-fifths vote to adopt a specific level of deficit spending. Further, the Congress could waive the amendment during time of war. Finally, the amendment would also require that any bill to increase taxes be approved by a majority of the whole number of both Houses.

It is clear that the budget deficit is a top priority with the American people. Additionally, this legislation would be a key step to reduce and ultimately eliminate the Federal deficit. The interest and attention which this problem has attracted speaks volumes as to the need for solutions to our Nation's runaway fiscal policy.

Our Constitution has been amended only 27 times in over 200 years. Amendment to the supreme law of our land is a serious endeavor which should only be reserved to protect the fundamental rights of our citizens or to ensure the survival of our system of government.

Mr. President, I believe that the very survival of our system of government is presently being jeopardized by an irrational and irresponsible pattern of spending which has become firmly entrenched in Federal fiscal policy over the last half-century. As a result, this fiscal policy has gone a long way toward seriously threatening the liberties and opportunities of our present and future citizens.

The Federal debt is over $4 trillion. Per capita, the Federal debt is over $16,000. This means that it would cost every man, woman, and child in America $16,000 each to pay off the public debt.

The Federal deficit for fiscal year 1992 was $290.2 billion. The Office of Management and Budget projected the deficit for fiscal year 1993 to be $341 billion. In order to solve the deficit problem, congressional spending must be addressed.

I have believed for many years that the way to reverse the misguided direction of the fiscal government is by amending the Constitution to mandate, except in extraordinary circumstances, balanced Federal budgets. I know many other Members of Congress join me in wanting to establish balanced budgets as a fiscal norm, rather than a fiscal anomaly.

Those who oppose a balanced budget constitutional amendment and opt instead for self-imposed congressional restraint must face the fact that this restraint has not been forthcoming. Importantly, the Congress has only balanced the Federal budget one time in the last 30 years. Meanwhile the level of annual budget deficits has grown enormously over this period of time. Continued deficit spending by the Federal Government will undoubtedly lead the Nation into more periods of economie stagnation and decline. The tax burdens which today's deficits will place on future generations of American workers is staggering. We must reverse the fiscal course of the Federal Government and a constitutional amendment is the only effective way to accomplish it. It is time for Congress to understand the simple fact that a government cannot survive by continuing to spend more money than it takes in.

Mr. President, the balanced budget amendment proposal has the support of many of our colleagues in the Congress, a Congress which holds diverse views on many issues. However, supporters of a balanced budget amendment share an unyielding commitment to restoring sanity to a spending process which is out of control and hurling our Nation headlong toward economic disaster.

I urge my colleagues to support this proposal so we may submit this important constitutional amendment to the States for ratification.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the amendment be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 8

"SECTION 4. Total receipts shall include all receipts of the United States except those derived from borrowing. Total outlays shall include all outlays of the United States except for those for repayment of debt principal.

By Mr. THURMOND (for himself and Mr. SIMPSON):

S.J. Res. 9. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to voluntary school prayer; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT
RELATING TO VOLUNTARY SCHOOL PRAYER

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today, I am introducing the voluntary school prayer constitutional amendment. This bill is identical to Senate Joint Resolution 73 which I introduced in the 98th Congress at the request of the President and reintroduced in the 99th, 100th, 101st, and 102d Congresses.

This proposal has received strong support from our colleagues on both sides of the aisle and is of vital importance to our Nation. It would restore the right to pray voluntarily in public schools—a right which was freely exercised under our Constitution until the 1960's, when the Supreme Court ruled to the contrary.

Also, in 1985, the Supreme Court ruled an Alabama statute unconstitutional which authorized teachers in public schools to provide "a period of silence  for meditation or voluntary prayer" at the beginning of each school day. As I stated when that opinion was issued and repeat again, the Supreme Court has too broadly interpreted the establishment clause of the first amendment and, in doing so, has incorrectly infringed on the rights of those children—and their parents—who wish to observe a moment of silence for religious or other purposes.

Until the Supreme Court ruled in the Engel and Abington School District decisions, the establishment clause of the first amendment was generally understood to prohibit the Federal Government from officially approving, or holding in special favor, any particular religious faith or denomination. In crafting that clause, our Founding Fathers sought to prevent what has originally caused many colonial Americans to emigrate to this country—an official, State religion. At the same time, they sought, through the free exercise clause, to guarantee to all Americans the freedom to worship God without government interference or restraint. In their wisdom, they recognized that true religious liberty precludes the Government from both forcing and preventing worship.

As Supreme Court Justice William Douglas once stated: "We are a religious people whose institutions presuppose a Supreme Being." Nearly every President since George Washington has proclaimed a day of public prayer. Moreover, we, as a nation, continue to recognize the Deity in our Pledge of Allegiance by affirming that we are a nation "under God." Our currency is inscribed with the motto, "In God We Trust". In this body, we open the Senate and begin our workday with the comfort and stimulus of voluntary group prayers; such a practice has been recently upheld as constitutional by the Supreme Court. It is absurd that the opportunity for the same beneficial experience is denied to the boys and girls who attend public schools. This situation simply does not comport with the intentions of the Framers of the Constitution and is, in fact, antithetical to the rights of our youngest citizens to freely exercise their respective religions. It should be changed, without further delay.

The Congress should swiftly pass this resolution and send it to the States for ratification. This amendment to the Constitution would clarify that it does not prohibit vocal, voluntary prayer in the public school and other public institutions. It emphatically states that no person may be required to participate in any prayer. The Government would be precluded from drafting school prayers. This well-crafted amendment enjoys the support of an overwhelming number of Americans. During the 98th Congress, we were only 11 votes short of the 67 necessary for approval in the Senate.

I strongly urge my colleagues to support prompt consideration and approval of this bill during this Congress and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 9

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution if ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission to the States by the Congress:

"ARTICLE—

"Nothing in this Constitution shall be construed to prohibit individual or group prayer in public schools or other public institutions. No person shall be required by the United States or by any State to participate in prayer. Neither the United States nor any State shall compose the words of any prayer to be said in public schools."

By Mr. HOLLINGS:

S.J. Res. 10. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution relative to contributions and expenditures intended to affect congressional and Presidential elections; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, in his inaugural speech yesterday, President Clinton issued a historic challenge to Congress. He said, "Let us resolve to reform our politics, so that power and privilege no longer shut down the voice of the people." To take up that challenge, the first order of business of the 103d Congress must be fundamental reform of our campaign finance laws.

Let us also resolve not to repeat the mistakes of the past efforts at campaign finance reform, which bogged down in partisanship as Democrats and Republicans each tried to gore the other's sacred cows. Let us cut directly at the root of the problem with a simple, straightforward, nonpartisan solution: a constitutional amendment empowering Congress and the States to set simple limits on the amount of money spent in campaigns for public office.

As Prof. Gerald G. Ashdown has written in the New England Law Review, amending the Constitution to allow Congress to regulate campaign expenditures is "the most theoretically attractive of the approaches [to reform] since, from a broad free speech perspective, the decision in Buckley is misguided and has worsened the campaign finance atmosphere." Adds Professor Ashdown: "If Congress could constitutionally limit the campaign expenditures of individuals, candidates, and committees, along with contributions, most of the troubles  would be eliminated."

Right to the point, in its landmark 1976 ruling in Buckley versus Valeo, the Supreme Court mistakenly equated a candidate's right to spend unlimited sums of money with his right to free speech. In the face of spirited dissents, the Court drew a bizarre distinction between campaign spending and campaign giving. For first amendment reasons, the Court struck down limits on campaign spending. But it upheld limits on campaign contributions on the grounds that "the governmental interest in preventing corruption and the appearance of corruption" outweighs considerations of free speech.

I have never been able to fathom why that same test—"the governmental interest in preventing corruption and the appearance of corruption"—does not overwhelmingly justify limits on campaign spending. However, it seems to me that the Court committed a far graver error by striking down spending limits as a threat to free speech. The fact is, spending limits in Federal campaigns would act to restore the free speech that has been eroded by Buckley versus Valeo.

After all, as a practical reality, what Buckley says is: Yes, if you have personal wealth, then you have access to television, you have freedom of speech. But if you do not have personal wealth, then you are denied access to television. Instead of freedom of speech, you have only the freedom to shut up.

So let us be done with this phony charge that spending limits are somehow an attack on freedom of speech. As Justice Byron White points out, clear as a bell, in his dissent, both contribution limits and spending limits "are neutral as to the content of speech and are not motivated by fear of the consequences of the political speech of particular candidates or of political speech in general."

Mr. President, every Senator realizes that television advertising is the name of the game in modern American politics. In warfare, if you control the air, you control the battlefield. In politics, if you control the airwaves, you control the tenor and focus of a campaign.

Probably 80 percent of campaign communications take place through the medium of television. And most of that TV airtime comes at a dear price. In South Carolina, you're talking some $2,400 for 30 seconds of prime time advertising. In New York City, you're talking more than $30,000 for the same 30 seconds.

The hard fact of life for a candidate is that if you're not on TV, you're not truly in the race. Wealthy challengers as well as incumbents flush with money go directly to the TV studio. Those without personal wealth are sidetracked to the time-consuming pursuit of cash.

Buckley versus Valeo created a double bind. It upheld restrictions on campaign contributions, but struck down restrictions on how much candidates with deep pockets can spend. The Court ignored the practical reality that if my opponent has only $50,000 to spend in a race and I have $1 million, then I can effectively deprive him of freedom of speech. By failing to respond to my advertising, my cash-poor opponent will appear unwilling to speak up in his own defense.

Justice Thurgood Marshall zeroed in on this disparity in his dissent to Buckley versus Valeo. By striking down the limit on what a candidate can spend, Justice Marshall said, "It would appear to follow that the candidate with a substantial personal fortune at his disposal is off to a significant head start."

Indeed, Justice Marshall went further: He argued that by upholding the limitations on contributions but striking down limits on overall spending, the Court put an additional premium on a candidate's personal wealth.

Justice Marshall was dead right. Our urgent task is to right the injustice of Buckley versus Valeo by empowering Congress to place caps on Federal campaign spending. We are all painfully aware of the uncontrolled escalation of campaign spending. The average cost of a winning Senate race was $1.2 million in 1980, rising to $2.1 million in 1984, and skyrocketing to $3.1 million in 1986, $3.7 million in 1988, and up, up, and away. To raise that kind of money, the average Senator must raise money at a rate of nearly $12,000 a week every week of his or her 6-year term. Overall spending in congressional races increased from $403 million in 1990 to $504 million in 1992—nearly a 20-percent increase in 2 years' time.

This obsession with money distracts us from the people's business. At worst, it corrupts and degrades the entire political process. Fundraisers used to be arranged so they didn't conflict with the Senate schedule; nowadays, the Senate schedule is regularly shifted to accommodate fundraisers.

I have run for statewide office 16 times in South Carolina. You establish a certain campaign routine, say, shaking hands at a mill shift in Greer, visiting the big country store outside of Belton, and so on. Over the years, they look for you and expect you to come around. They say, "Here he comes again. It must be election time." But in recent years, those mill visits and dropping by the country store have become a casualty of the system. There is very little time for them. I'm out chasing dollars.

During my 1986 reelection campaign, I found myself raising money to get on TV to raise money to get on TV to raise money to get on TV. It's a vicious cycle. The rule was, if you had money, I had the time to meet with you.

After the election, I held a series of town meetings across the State. Friends asked, "Why are you doing these town meetings? You just got elected. You've got 6 years." To which I answered, "I'm doing it because it's my first chance to really get out and meet with the people who elected me. I didn't get much of a chance during the campaign. I was too busy raising bucks." I had a similar experience in 1992.

I remember Senator Richard Russell saying: "They give you a 6-year term in this U.S. Senate: 2 years to be a statesman, the next 2 years to be a politician, and the last 2 years to be a demagogue." Regrettably, we are no longer afforded even 2 years as statesmen. We proceed straight to demagoguery right after the election because of the imperatives of raising money.

My proposed constitutional amendment would change all this. It would empower Congress to impose reasonable spending limits on Federal campaigns. For instance, we could impose a limit of, say, $700,000 per Senate candidate in a small State like South Carolina—a far cry from the millions spent by my opponent and me in 1992. And bear in mind that direct expenditures account for only a portion of total spending. For instance, my 1992 opponent's direct expenditures were supplemented by hundreds of thousands of dollars in expenditures by independent organizations and by the State and local Republican Party. When you total up spending from all sources, my challenger and I spent roughly the same amount in 1992.

And incidentally, Mr. President, let's be done with the canard that spending limits would be a boon to incumbents, who supposedly already have name recognition and standing with the public and therefore begin with a built-in advantage over any challengers. Nonsense. I hardly need to remind my Senate colleagues of the high rate of electoral mortality in the upper Chamber. And as to the alleged invulnerability of incumbents in the House, I would simply note that more than 25 percent of the House membership was replaced in the 1992 election alone.

I can tell you from experience that any advantages of incumbency are more than counterbalanced by the obvious disadvantages of incumbency, specifically the disadvantage of defending hundreds of controversial votes in Congress.

I also agree with University of Virginia political scientist Larry Sabato, who has suggested a doctrine of sufficiency with regard to campaign spending. Professor Sabato puts it this way: "While challengers tend to be underfunded, they can compete effectively if they are capable and have sufficient money to present themselves and their messages."

Moreover, Mr. President, I submit that once we have overall spending limits, it will matter little whether a candidate gets money from industry groups, or from PAC's, or from individuals. It is still a reasonable—sufficient to use Professor Sabato's term—amount any way you cut it. Spending will be under control, and we will be able to account for every dollar coming in and every dollar going out.

On the issue of PAC's, Mr. President, let me say that I have never believed that PAC's per se are an evil in the current system. On the contrary, PAC's are a very healthy instrumentality of politics. PAC's have brought people into the political process: nurses, educators, small business people, senior citizens, unionists, you name it. They permit people of modest means and zero individual influence to band together with others of mutual interest knowing that their contribution is heard and known.

For years we have encouraged these people to get involved, to participate. Yet now that they are participating, we turn around and say, "Oh, no, your influence is corrupting, your money is tainted." This is wrong. The evil to be corrected is not the abundance of participation but the superabundance of money. The culprit is runaway campaign spending.

To a distressing degree, elections are determined not in the political marketplace but in the financial marketplace. Our elections are supposed to be contests of ideas, but too often they degenerate into megadollar derbies, paper chases through the board rooms of corporations and special interests.

I have been amused by the junior Senator from Kentucky's contention that we spend too little in our Federal campaigns. He has edified the Senate and elevated the debate by propounding his eloquent "Kibbles 'n' Bits" defense; that is, the point that America spends more on cat food than it does on Federal campaigns. I submit that this fact speaks more to the number of overfed cats in our Nation than to the number of underfunded candidates. Moreover, to raise the "Kibbles 'n' Bits" banner is, in my opinion, one more unfortunate example of vulgar, marketplace values run amok. Federal offices are not like cat food; they should not be up for sale.

Mr. President, I repeat, campaign spending must be brought under control. The constitutional amendment I have proposed would permit Congress to impose fair, responsible, workable limits on Federal campaign expenditures.

Such a reform would have four important impacts. One, it would end the mindless pursuit of ever-fatter campaign war chests. Two, it would free candidates from their current obsession with fundraising and allow them to focus more on issues and ideas; once elected to office, we wouldn't have to spend 20 percent of our time raising money to keep our seats. Three, it would curb the influence of special interests. And four, it would create a more level playing field for our Federal campaigns—a competitive environment where personal wealth does not give candidates an insurmountable advantage.

Finally, Mr. President, a word about the advantages of the amend-the-Constitution approach that I propose. Recent history amply demonstrates the practicality and viability of this constitutional route. Certainly, it is no coincidence that all five of the most recent amendments to the Constitution have dealt with Federal election issues. In elections, the process drives and shapes the end result. Election laws can skew election results, whether you're talking about a poll tax depriving minorities of their right to vote, or the absence of campaign spending limits giving an unfair advantage to wealthy candidates. These are profound issues which go to the heart of our democracy, and it is entirely appropriate that they be addressed through amendment of the Constitution.

And let's not be distracted by the argument that the amend-the-Constitution approach will take too long. Take too long? We have been dithering on this campaign finance issue since early 1970, and we haven't advanced the ball a single yard. It has been 20 years now, and no legislative solution has done the job.

The last five constitutional amendments took an average of 17 months to be adopted. There is no reason why we cannot pass this joint resolution, submit it to the States for a vote, and ratify the amendment in time for it to govern the 1994 election. Indeed, the amend-the-Constitution approach could prove more expeditious than the alternative legislative approach. Bear in mind that the various public financing bills that have been proposed would all be vulnerable to a Presidential veto. In contrast, this joint resolution, once passed by the Congress, goes directly to the States for ratification. Once ratified, it becomes the law of the land, and is not subject to veto.

And, by the way, I reject the argument that—if we were to pass and ratify this amendment—Democrats and Republicans would be unable to hammer out a mutually acceptable formula of campaign-expenditure limits. A Democratic Congress and Republican President did exactly that in 1974: we set reasonable, bipartisan limits, by law. We did it in 1974, and we can certainly do it again.

Mr. President, this joint resolution will address the campaign finance mess directly, decisively, and with finality. The Supreme Court has chosen to ignore the overwhelming importance of media advertising in today's campaigns. In Buckley versus Valeo, it prescribed a bogus "if you have the money you can talk" version of free speech. In its place, I urge passage of this joint resolution, the freedom of speech in political campaigns amendment. Let us ensure equal freedom of expression for all who seek Federal office.

By Mr. SARBANES (for himself, Mr. GLENN, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. DASCHLE, Mr. DORGAN, Mr. HOLLINGS, Ms. MIKULSKI, Mr. HATCH, and Mr. STEVENS):

S.J. Res. 11. Joint resolution to designate May 3, 1993, through May 9, 1993, as "Public Service Recognition Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PUBLIC SERVICE RECOGNITION DAY

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a resolution designating the week of May 3-9, 1993, as "Public Service Recognition Week." I have introduced similar resolutions in previous Congresses to honor the public servants who so diligently and faithfully serve our Nation at the State, local, and Federal level.

The 9 million city and county workers, 4 million State employees, and 5 million Federal civilian and military employees who serve the public perform some of our Nation's most critical and important tasks. These are the men and women who defend our Nation and educate our children. They keep our food and drinking water safe and come to our aid should fire, flood, or other disasters strike our homes and communities. They work to find new treatments for cancer and AIDS, and to develop new technologies to improve and enhance our lives.

Their collective mission is integral to preserving our health, safety, and standard of living, yet public servants are rarely recognized for their efforts unless there is a disruption in the level of service to which the public is accustomed. Consequently, theirs is a thankless job; and one which they have had to perform under increasingly adverse conditions.

Today, government at every level is bound by severe fiscal constraints. The recent recession, and continued weak economic performance, have exacerbated budgetary pressures and forced governments to cut back or eliminate basic services. States and municipalities have been particularly hard hit and forced to lay off thousands of employees. Those who have not been laid off are asked to provide the same services with fewer available resources. In fact, the fiscal crisis has been such that last Congress, I introduced legislation to provide emergency grants and loans to State and local governments to assist them in meeting urgent public needs.

I regret some in government have seized upon public employees' vulnerability in these tough economic times and attacked and denigrated them publicly. For more than a decade, public employees, especially at the Federal level, have confronted budget cuts which if not aimed at their very livelihood, targeted their pay or pensions or health benefits. Yet, despite what has been a hostile political and economic climate, public employees continue to perform their duties in an effective and efficient manner. In fact, a Congressional Budget Office [CBO] study found that for most of the last decade, government productivity has grown at a rate nearly twice that of the private sector.

Yesterday, the Nation embraced a new President and with him hopes for positive and dramatic change. It is my own hope that this change will encompass the relationship between those we elect to lead our country and the millions whose duty it is to carry out this mission every day, thereby enabling a new relationship and partnership to be born—one that is positive, cooperative, and necessarily more productive.

As we eagerly seek to engage the major challenges before us—the problems afflicting our economy, our health care system, and the safety of our streets—we must remember the millions of public servants who quietly attend to the people's work in Social Security and employment offices, in VA hospitals and health clinics, and in fire halls and police stations across our 50 States. As John F. Kennedy so succinctly put it in 1961, it is they who "conduct our generation's most important business, the public's business."

Mr. President, perhaps more than in any year I have served in the Congress, it is important this year to tell the millions who so dutifully serve our Nation that their contributions and commitment do not go unnoticed. By setting aside a week as "Public Service Recognition Week", we make a small but meaningful statement to public servants throughout the land—that their work, so often unrecognized, is vital and important and that we as individuals and as a nation depend on it each and every day. I am most pleased to introduce this resolution on this special and historic day, and I urge my colleagues to join me in working for its swift passage.

By Mr. DECONCINI (for himself and Mr. EXON):

S.J. Res. 12. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to limit congressional terms; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT TO LIMIT CONGRESSIONAL TERMS

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I rise today with my distinguished colleague Senator EXON to introduce legislation to limit the terms of office of Members of Congress. Since 1977, when I first came to the U.S. Senate, I have introduced legislation to limit the tenure of Members of Congress. I believe such legislation is necessary to restore the fundamental principles of representative government.

My legislation will limit Senators to two 6-year terms and Representatives to six 2-year terms, limiting all Members to 12 years in office. Terms being served by standing Members of Congress would not count against the limitation. Thus, all current Members will be eligible for the full number of terms allowed under the amendment.

The idea for term limits is not new. It was first raised by our Founding Fathers during the Constitutional Convention in 1787 which laid it aside as entering too much into detail. Support for term limits has come from a bipartisan list of leaders including Abraham Lincoln, Harry Truman, Dwight D. Eisenhower, and John F. Kennedy.

After Franklin Roosevelt served an unprecedented four terms as President, many Members of Congress and the public were concerned about what they saw as the possible beginning of a new monarchy. This fear was resolved with the passage of the 22d amendment in 1951, limiting Presidents to two terms. This amendment, however, did nothing about the problem of Representatives and Senators turning their elected terms into nearly indefinite stays in office.

Term limits are needed to reinject democracy into the political process. I believe they will assure a consistent influx of new Members bringing new ideas and innovative plans. A Congress invigorated by frequent infusions of new blood would be more responsive, more democratic and more focused on solving the problems facing this country. It would assure a consistent and systematic means of renewal and rotation of Members and would allow more citizens the opportunity to serve in Congress.

Term limits also would guard against the effects of the seniority system, which places considerable power in the hands of Members solely based on their years of service. Currently, Members of Congress who have served the longest are rewarded by committee assignments and chairmanships, from which they can provide special benefits to home State interests. The average tenure of a committee chairman in the House is 26 years, and in the Senate 20 years.

Limiting congressional terms would enhance competition for Members and increase political opportunities for minorities and women. It may also give Congress the political courage needed to take stands on controversial issues, like our budget deficit.

Public support for term limits is strong. State initiatives to limit terms passed in all 14 States where it was placed on the ballot. Some 21 million people in these States voted to place limits on the tenure of Federal office holders. Furthermore, a Gallup Poll commissioned in 1991 revealed that 70 percent of the American people support term limits for Members of Congress.

Despite these efforts on the State level to limit terms, a constitutional amendment is needed. The constitutionality of the State initiatives is questionable and is unlikely to be resolved for at least 2 years. In addition, I believe all States should be subject to the same limits. States complying with a limit on terms would be at a great disadvantage under the current congressional seniority system.

Obviously term limits alone are not the answer to all the problems our Government currently faces. However, growing voter apathy is undoubtedly tied to the public's feeling of being shut out of the workings of their Government. Term limitations, enacted in conjunction with campaign finance reform, would be an important step toward restoring public confidence in the Federal Government, rather than government being the target of their ridicule and scorn.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I am pleased today to join Senator DENNIS DECONCINI, as I have during the last two Congresses, as an original cosponsor of a constitutional amendment to impose term limits on Federal officials.

My longstanding support for Federal term limits has now been supplemented by a sense of urgency. Fifteen States now have term limits for Federal officials. Fourteen of the fifteen States just passed them in November and Colorado passed its version in 1990. All 15 States call for 12-year limits on U.S. Senators. Regarding terms for U.S. House Members in these 15 States, their limits vary from 6 to 12 years.

The legislation being introduced today calls for 12-year terms for each of these two offices. We believe this is the best approach and a workable compromise.

My sense of urgency stems from the need for fairness through uniformity for the States as they are represented in the House and Senate. Over time, States which have instituted term limits on their own will be at a severe disadvantage with respect to States which do not have such restrictions on their Senators and Congressmen. Furthermore, only 23 States have the initiative process. Until we get some fairness and uniformity for all States, we are headed for a train wreck.

Mr. President, the voters of my own State of Nebraska spoke loud and clear for term limits in November by a vote of 68 to 32 percent. Despite my opposition to unilateral action by individual States on this issue, I nevertheless pledged the very next day to redouble my efforts for Federal term limits across the board. My action today is the first step in fulfilling that pledge.

There is great controversy regarding the constitutionality of States imposing term limits on their own Members of Congress. I am certain that the courts will resolve this question in due course. However, regardless of how the courts eventually rule, this constitutional amendment needs to be passed by Congress and moved forward to the States for ratification.

I look forward to working with Senator DECONCINI and moving aggressively to pass this important legislation.

By Mr. THURMOND:

S.J. Res. 13. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today I am introducing a proposed amendment to the Constitution which would require Federal judges and certain other officers of the United States to forfeit their offices upon conviction of a felony.

I believe that the citizens of the United States will agree that those who have been convicted of felonies should not be allowed to continue to occupy positions of trust and responsibility in our Government. Nevertheless, under current constitutional law it is possible for certain officers of the United States to continue to receive a salary even after being convicted of a felony. It they are unwilling to resign, the only method which may be used to remove them from the Federal payroll is impeachment, a process which can occupy a great deal of valuable time and resources of the Congress.

Currently, the Congress has the power to impeach officers of the Government who have committed treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. However, when a court has found an official guilty of a serious crime, it should not be necessary for Congress to then essentially re-try the official before he or she can be removed from the Federal payroll.

The constitutional amendment which I am introducing will provide that any officer of the United States who is appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, upon conviction of a felony and exhaustion of all direct appeals, shall be removed from office and shall lose all salary and benefits arising from service in such office.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to carefully consider this proposal and ask that it be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 13

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution if ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years after its submission to the State for ratification:

"ARTICLE—

"Any officer of the United States appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, upon conviction of a felony, shall forfeit office and all prerogatives, benefits, or compensation thereof."

By Mr. THURMOND:

S.J. Res. 14. Joint resolution to designate the month of May 1993 as "National Foster Care Month"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL FOSTER CARE MONTH

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce today a Senate joint resolution which would designate May of 1993 as "National Foster Care Month."

It is acknowledged that a family environment with loving and caring parents is the ideal situation for children. However, in the United States there are hundreds of thousands of foster children who, through no fault of their own, have been deprived of this normal home relationship involving love, shelter and other needs that are the basic necessities of all children. Foster parents volunteer their time, energy, and material resources 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, to help enable these children to develop into mature, responsible, and productive adults.

Our Nation's foster parents have a long and proud tradition of reaching out to those children who need them most. We need to publicly recognize these efforts and call attention to the vital needs of all foster children in the United States. Acknowledgment of the valuable contributions of foster care parents will provide for greater public awareness of and community support for these Americans.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this resolution.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this resolution be printed at the end of my remarks.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 14

Whereas there are more than 100,000 licensed foster families in the United States who temporarily provide guidance, emotional support, food, shelter, and nurture to children who cannot remain in their own home;

Whereas foster parents devotedly and unselfishly open their home and family life to children in need;

Whereas foster parents are a vital part in permanency planning to protect the best interests of a foster child;

Whereas foster parents work cooperatively with human service agencies and biological parents to strengthen family life;

Whereas foster parents must have the commitment of the national, State and local communities in terms of funding, support, and training; and

Whereas the National Foster Parent Association holds its annual training conference during the month of May 1993: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the month of May 1993, is designated as "National Foster Care Month". The President is requested to issue a proclamation calling on the people of the United States to observe such month with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

By Mr. THURMOND (for himself and Mr. SIMPSON):

S.J. Res. 15. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to allow the President to veto items of appropriation; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT
RELATIVE TO LINE-ITEM VETO

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a proposed constitutional amendment which would give authority to the President to disapprove specific items of appropriation on any act of joint resolution submitted to him. This authority is commonly referred to as line-item veto.

Too often during debate on the budget, the discussion focuses on ways to enhance revenues. The Congress must address runaway spending if we are truly going to establish a sound fiscal policy for this Nation.

The Federal debt exceeds $4 trillion and payment of interest on the debt is the second largest item in the budget. The budget deficit for fiscal year 1992 was over $290 billion. The Office of Management and Budget projects the deficit for fiscal year 1993 to possibly reach $341 billion. We must take strong, disciplinary action to ensure fiscal responsibility.

The Congress regularly enacts appropriations measures, totaling billions and billions of dollars. Too often there are items tucked away in these bills that represent millions of dollars and they would have very little chance of passing on their own merit. Yet, the President has no discretion to weed out these unnecessary expenditures and must approve or disapprove the bill in its entirety.

Presidential authority for line-item veto is a badly needed fiscal tool which would provide a valuable means to reduce and restrain excessive appropriations.

Forty-three Governors currently have, in one form or another, the power to reduce or eliminate items or provisions in appropriation measures. Surely, the President should have the same discretionary authority that 43 Governors now have to check unbridled spending.

It is my hope that this Congress will swiftly approve line-item veto and send a clear message to the American people that we are making a serious effort to set our Nation's fiscal house in order.

I urge my colleagues to support this proposal and our efforts to make it part of our Constitution.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this proposal be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 15

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years after the date of its submission to the States for ratification:

"ARTICLE—

"The President may disapprove any item of appropriation in any Act or joint resolution. If an Act or joint resolution is approved by the President, any item of appropriation contained therein which is not disapproved shall become law. The President shall return with his objections any item of appropriation disapproved to the House in which the Act or joint resolution containing such item originated. The Congress may, in the manner prescribed under section 7 of article I for Acts disapproved by the President, reconsider any item of appropriation disapproved under this article."

By Mr. PELL:

S.J. Res. 17. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the commencement of the terms of the office of President, Vice President, and Members of Congress; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT
RELATIVE TO COMMENCEMENT OF TERMS

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, today, January 21, 1993, the day after the 52d inauguration of the President of the United States, has finally arrived. It seems like an eternity since last November when the American public chose Bill Clinton to be our 42d President. Since that time, we have committed troops to a country halfway across the globe, the economy has taken a different course, we have engaged once again in military operations in the Persian Gulf, and rather than being hard at work on legislative proposals, we are just getting them introduced. We have been in a holding pattern since early October when the final push prior to the election began. While some time is necessary for the transfer of power and the changing of the guard, the amount of time we take to do so is too long and unnecessary.

To address this, I am introducing once again a constitutional amendment which would shorten the Presidential transition period. This amendment would change the Presidential inauguration date from January 20 to December 10 and the congressional swearing-in date to December 1, necessary because of the need of Congress to verify the results of the electoral college. By doing so, we will accelerate the changeover and thereby permit quicker action on the voters' mandate delivered in the election, create a more sensible budgetmaking process, and greatly lessen the opportunity for exploitation by foreign countries of the uncertainty which currently surrounds our protracted transition of power.

The current inauguration date was set in 1933, when it was determined that advances in election result verification and travel permitted moving it up from March 4, the date set by our Founding Fathers when travel and the conduct of elections were a much less easy affair. It also became evident that the delay unnecessarily prevented the newly elected President Roosevelt from promptly implementing programs to deal with the Depression.

In a similar manner, there is no reason not to advance the inauguration date today. Election results are now known within hours of the closing of the polls and travel to Washington from the most distant parts of the country can be completed in a day. No mechanical impediment today exists to the prompt installation of our elected officials.

But the current policy is more than simply outdated for functional reasons: It presents substantial potential for harm. Domestically, it delays the consideration and implementation of new programs mandated by the election. It presents an opportunity for hostile rulemaking by agency officials who will soon be leaving their posts. Worst of all, it results in the absurdity of having the budget for the next fiscal year prepared by the outgoing administration while the incoming administration will face a 2-week deadline to amend it to include their policy prerogatives. A shorter transition would address these problems.

Internationally, foreign governments are unsure about who speaks for the United States and may be able to take advantage of the muddled chain of command in Washington. I believe that a clear example of such has been played out during this transition with the mischief that is being carried out in the Middle East by Saddam Hussein. Fortunately, the United States and the international community have been able to respond in a cohesive fashion to the Iraqi violations of the U.N. terms which ended the Persian Gulf conflict. It has also been abundantly evident, however, that while waiting for the Clinton administration to take over, there existed a potential state of policy limbo and possible confusion in the mind of an adversary as to who had the final word in dealing with this situation. Such an awkward situation is unnecessary. By shortening the transition period, we would greatly reduce the potential for this kind of mischief.

For these reasons and more, the time has come to shorten the Presidential transition. I submit for the RECORD an article I wrote on this proposal which appeared in the Los Angeles Times on December 15 last year. I also include a copy of an editorial written by Arthur Schlesinger which appeared in the Wall Street Journal on December 3, 1992, and an article from the January 18, 1993, issue of Investor's Business Daily which references this proposal. I also include a story from the Washington Post in which President Bush makes the obvious and straightforward point that "the interregnum is too long, too ungenerous and too long."

It is my hope that as the Senate contemplates proposals to reform our political process and make it more responsive to the people, action will be taken on this amendment and we will end this outdated and unnecessary practice.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Los Angeles Times, Dec. 15, 1992]

WE VOTE, THEN WE WAIT—MUCH TOO LONG
(By Claiborne Pell)

Dec. 10 should have been Inauguration Day.

If it had been, President Clinton would have his Cabinet in place, his budget team would be at work on next year's budget and the new Congress would be sworn in and ready to work on legislation proposed by our new President. The federal government would then be poised to carry out the election mandate delivered by voters in early November.

Instead, it has been more than a month since election Day and action in Washington has come to a halt while the transition between the Bush and Clinton administrations grinds on with press conferences, introductory White House visits, Cabinet appointment speculation, policy summits and, with the exception of the situation in Somalia, a time-out called in American dealings in world affairs.

The simple fact is that the length of our current transition period is by no means required for the operation of our system of government, yet it presents a constant potential for trouble in both domestic and world affairs.

The current inauguration date, Jan. 20, was moved from March 4 in 1933 by the 20th Amendment to the Constitution. Times continue to change, and there is no reason not to have the inauguration on Dec. 10. Beyond being an outdated functional policy, keeping our government in limbo for 2½ months presents substantial potential for harm:

It delays immediate work on new programs mandated by the election and it presents an opportunity for hostile rulemaking by agency officials who will soon be stepping down from their posts.

It results in the absurd procedure of having the outgoing administration prepare the budget for the next fiscal year only to have it amended within two weeks by the incoming administration.

It creates uncertainty internationally because foreign governments are unsure about who speaks for the country and can take advantage of the muddled chain of command in Washington.

In this election in particular, a clear mandate for change and for immediate action on our nation's ills was given by the voters on Election Day. They asked for this change after listening to, and often enduring, an intense, year-long discussion of the issues and the candidates' prospective solutions.

Having made their choice, voters are entitled to have their will carried out speedily by the officials they have chosen. But our current 10-week transition period thwarts any speedy action on the Election Day mandate.

The question, is why not change the schedule of events? There has been significant clamor over the past few years to make our government more responsive to the people. Here is one common-sense proposal that will cost nothing and will contribute substantially to governmental responsiveness and efficiency.

[From the Washington Post, Nov. 18, 1992]

BUSH FINDS TRANSITION AN "UNGENEROUS" TIME

If the Constitution allowed abdication, President Bush would probably hand over the Oval Office to Bill Clinton today and be done with it, so sour is he already on the lifestyle of a figurehead president.

"I've concluded that the interregnum is too long, too ungenerous and too long," Bush said Monday night of the transition he has endured for only two of its scheduled 10 weeks, "but we are determined to finish this."

The problem is, there is not much to finish.

Having endured the vice presidency for eight years, Bush has had experience in having no real job. According to White House aides, he accepts it. He just does not much like what one aide called "the endless endings with no startings."

White House press secretary Marlin Fitzwater said yesterday much of what makes up "the normal life of the presidency" is already gone, leaving Bush with "desk work. It's not the most exciting duty on earth."

Much of what the public sees of the presidency—pictures of meetings with foreign leaders; the opening of Cabinet meetings; meeting with business, social or religious leaders—is not occurring. "You really drop all the ceremonial things," Fitzwater said, because most of the groups, organizations and leaders want to meet with the incoming, not the outgoing, president.

Another big chunk of the presidency is policy debates, and with little policy to be made, there are few debates.

"We all kind of wish the transition lasted two days rather than two months," Fitzwater said. "But we all recognize that he [Clinton] needs this time to assemble his team and prepare" and that federal government business, from regulatory actions to date-sensitive actions required by law or custom must go on.

The Office of Management and Budget is preparing a 100-page budget summary, rather than the full fiscal budget normally required, whose main utility will be to give the Democrats baseline numbers from which to launch their economic and fiscal programs. The Council of Economic Advisers is preparing its required report on the economy; the Council on Environmental Quality is preparing its report.

Bush is considering some sort of public summing up but has not decided what it should be. Presidents have used their final say for memorable speeches (Dwight D. Eisenhower's address on the military-industrial complex) or written reports on their presidencies (Jimmy Carter). Bush has not made up his mind what to do or how, but it most likely would center on the Cold War's end and the safer world his grandchildren have inherited.

Bush touched on that Monday night, when he crossed the street to the Blair House to receive a diplomatic award. The White House announced the event was closed to the press, but a United Press International reporter got permission from the sponsors to attend and recorded the president in a moment of salute to how governmental power is transferred.

"I think that when the history books are written, it will be seen that we made dramatic strides toward world peace and toward improving relations in so many parts of the world," Bush said. "And that is the great satisfaction that I have as I draw to a close, with two months left that are laborious."

The campaign, Bush said, is over, and he contended it was no rougher than campaigns in this century have been. "The gloves came off and we went at it hard and that's the way I like it, the way it ought to be, and if The Washington Post doesn't like it, too damn bad," he said.

The gears of government "are beginning to shift" to Clinton, he said, "as they should." This smooth transition is something Americans take for granted, he said, but they should recognize as "special . . . the stability that comes from one administration handing off the torch to the other."

The next ceremonial step of that handoff will occur today in what is still Bush's White House. The president, with hundreds of reporters and photographers gathered in the Rose Garden to record the event, will emerge from the Oval Office to walk down to the driveway to greet President-elect Clinton and take him to the gleaming white colonnade alongside the Oval Office.

The white-columned setting that faces the Rose Garden has been the scene of much Bush history, meetings with Mikhail Gorbachev and Boris Yeltsin, handshakes with Mother Teresa and rock stars, greetings of leaders from small nations and from winning sports teams. They all have posed with Bush on the colonnade and so too will Clinton today. And then the two will go alone, without aides, into the Oval Office.

SHORTEN THE PRESIDENTIAL TRANSITION

(By Arthur Schlesinger, Jr.)

"I've concluded," President Bush said the other day, "that the interregnum is too long." He is right, and maybe it is time to do something about it. The present transition is not only too long; it is also too elaborate and too expensive and, in certain circumstances, too risky. Do we really need 11 weeks to carry out the shift from one president to the next?

Actually, until 60 years ago, the transition lasted four months. This was reasonable enough in the days before the railroad and the airplane. It took time and trouble then for legislators to get to Washington. But there remained the void between the old administration and the new, that ambiguous time when one authority slowly fades away and another awaits anointment. Could the government really afford those four months of paralysis every four years?

Most of the time in earlier days, it could. But in 1916 the election fell in the midst of World War I. President Woodrow Wilson feared the international consequences of executive impotence and prepared a contingency plan in case he lost (as in fact he nearly did).

"THE GRAVEST DANGERS"

If the Republican candidate, Charles Evans Hughes, won, Mr. Wilson said, "During those four months I would be without such moral backing from our nation as would be necessary to steady and control our relations with other governments . . . and yet the accredited spokesman would be without legal authority to speak for the nation. Such a situation would be fraught with the gravest dangers." If he lost, President Wilson said, he would therefore appoint Mr. Hughes to be secretary of state; then Mr. Wilson and his vice president would resign, and Mr. Hughes, under the succession law of the time, would become president without delay.

The interregnum between the defeat of Herbert Hoover and the accession of Franklin D. Roosevelt came at the bottom of the Depression in another time of emergency. By then people were conscious of the dangers of floating in the void, and that great Nebraska senator, George W. Norris, finally persuaded the nation to accept the 20th Amendment, which moved Inauguration Day back to Jan. 20 from March 4 and cut the interval of floating to 10 or 11 weeks.

The 20th Amendment was an important step in the modernization of the presidency. But did it go far enough? No other democracy suffers through a protracted twilight period when one administration painfully expires, the next waits impatiently to take over and the nation and the world wonder anxiously who's in charge. "Two weeks into the transition, with another nine to go," writes the Economist, "Washington is in danger of losing its tenuous grip on reality."

In Britain a prime minister who has lost an election moves out of 10 Downing Street in a couple of days and the successor moves right in. "The only operation to which I can compare the Whitehall drill for a change in government," wrote R.H.S. Crossman, the Labor minister and student of the British Constitution, "is the hospital drill for removing a corpse from the ward and replacing it with a new patient." All other democracies that I know about transfer power with similar expedition. In Washington, however, the corpse lies in state for 2½ months while the successors quarrel over the inheritance.

Still worse, the process by which power is transferred in the U.S. has been inflated into a formidable and costly operation. Under that mischievous statute, the Presidential Transition Act of 1963, the Reagan transition in 1980-81 hired 1,500 people and occupied a 10-story office building. What could those 1,500 people have done? Mr. Clinton will receive $3.5 million for his transition, and reports are that the transition staff doesn't consider this enough and plans to collect more funds from the private sector—not a very good idea.

This bureaucratic orgy baffles those of us who remember that for nearly two centuries presidents managed to succeed each other without making a Cecil B. DeMille production of it. As late as the 1960 transition, John Kennedy set up one small group headed by Clark Clifford and Richard Neustadt to consider government organization, another small group headed by Sargent Shriver to recruit personnel, and a number of expert task forces to deal with substantive questions in major areas of decision. The transition from Eisenhower to Kennedy took place with speed and efficiency, and it cost the taxpayer precisely nothing.

Life is surely not all that more complicated today. Nor can one believe that swarms of eager beavers roaming around Washington, promoting themselves, body checking competitors and turning out reports that no one will read, will increase either speed or efficiency. I am glad to see that Prof. Neustadt, the inadvertent cause of the Presidential Transition Act, confesses responsibility in the New York Times and throws himself on the mercy of the court. The first step in restoring rationality to the transition would be the repeal of that troublemaking law. For, if people are given $3.5 million to spend, they will find ways to spend it.

The second step would be to take a hard look at the constitutional amendment, long since proposed by Sens. Claiborne Pell and Charles Mathias, moving the inauguration date back to Nov. 20 from Jan. 20. This amendment would reduce the postelection interval of national paralysis. It would eliminate the need for the lame-duck president to submit a pointless budget that his successor is bound to discard. It would prevent departing administrations from making agreements and issuing executive orders designed to thwart or embarrass the new crowd. It would relieve Washington of the depressing sight of an administration that is dead but not permitted down.

Maybe Nov. 20 does not leave enough time for the president-elect to rest up the campaign, for election passions to and for final decisions to be made. Maybe the second week of December, by that time most new cabinet members are seen anyway, would be a better date for inauguration. But let us further mode the presidency by bringing it up to speed of the electronic age.

THE GREAT OBJECTION

The great objection is that the chance would not leave an incoming administration enough time for calm consideration of policies and appointments. The British situation, it is pointed out, is different because the opposition already has an election manifesto and a "shadow government," because cabinet nominees are of known quantities selected from members of Parliament and because political appointees hold fewer top jobs—and public servants more—than in the U.S.

But a new president should certainly have his policies pretty well in hand by the time of the election. As for recruitment of John Macy Jr., former chairman of the Civil Service Commission and a respected expert on public administration, testified before the Senate Judiciary Committee some years ago in favor of the Pell-Mathias approach, made it clear that he did not regard the appointments problem a very strong argument against shortening time interregnum.

For that matter, why would it not be a good idea for presidential candidates to be forced to think before the election about the programs they intend to present to Congress and the people they might want to bring into their administration? The discipline of advance planning would be a salutary reminder for those who occupy the White House that winning the election is only the prelude to governing the Nation.

THE PRESIDENT'S LONG GOODBYE—IS 2½ MONTHS TOO LONG OF A TRANSITION PERIOD?
(By Paul Sperry)

The White House interregnum—the long transition period between U.S. presidencies—has been both a blessing and a curse for President-elect Clinton.

On the one hand, he has had time to conveniently alter his campaign's economic blueprint, including tabling plans for fiscal pump-priming and tax breaks, to adjust to new indications of economic strength.

And he has had a chance to review—and reverse—his position on allowing asylum to Haitian refugees.

But, outside of good economic news, other recent developments have proven less advantageous as well as potentially dangerous.

And it's this precarious downside that has some analysts calling for a truncated version of the 2½ month transition period. President Bush also has called for a shorter transition. "The current transition is not only too long (but) in certain circumstances, too risky," Pulitzer-winning historian Arthur Schlesinger said recently.

Like a kicker going in cold to decide a close football game, Clinton will immediately inherit an incendiary situation in the Persian Gulf from the outgoing president.

Instead of having his hand on the throttle, Clinton has watched from the back seat. He has received second-hand intelligence about the renewed conflict with Iraq. The outgoing president's security advisers have informed the incoming president's appointed security advisers who, in turn, have informed Clinton.

The seeming split in command has created the appearance of two governments.

After U.S. forces struck targets in southern Iraq on Wednesday, Americans watched back-to-back press conferences. One was held in Washington and one in Little Rock, Ark. One was handled by a spokesman for the president, the other by a spokesman for the president-elect.

The White House asserts that Clinton has been duly apprised of decisions as they have unfolded. Bush, in fact, has spoken directly to Clinton.

But Bush is still the one calling the shots.

In a few days, he'll be handing over the controls to a new president who, though competent, has no hands-on experience in national security matters.

Some defense analysts expressed less concern about Clinton's nerve than about the public's apparent perception of duality in government.

"I've been a little troubled by talk of there being two administrations," said John Luddy, a defense policy expert at the Washington-based Heritage Foundation.

Nonetheless, Clinton's foreign policy team will be installed in the throes of an unresolved, volatile conflict—one over which Clinton had no role in shaping. Clinton will quickly get a heavy dose of realpolitik, whether he's ready or not.

But Luddy says that if Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein tried to take advantage of a perceived period of impotence or disunity in the U.S. government, "it hasn't worked."

"He shows a real lack of understanding of our system," he added. "The Clinton team was briefed extensively. I'm not sure there's a systemic problem."

David Ochmanek, a Rand Corp. defense analyst, agrees, adding that Clinton has said he will support Bush's policy and will probably err on the side of being hawkish.

"I don't see a potential for a policy problem developing in the hand-off," he said.

DANGEROUS WINDOW?

But others blame the long interregnum for giving dictators like Saddam the opportunity to miscalculate U.S. weakness. At more than 11 weeks, it leaves a window wide open for such unexpectedly dangerous developments.

The kind of nerve-racking transition happening now is rare.

The lame-duck period has, for the most part, historically lived up to its name. Presidents usually bow out quietly, without enacting much new domestic policy. Engaging a foreign enemy in fresh military combat is doubly rare.

White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater, upon answering reporters' questions Wednesday, said the current chain of events was unprecedented.

In fact, President Nixon inherited an unfinished war from President Johnson in 1968.

But, unlike Clinton, Nixon had prior involvement in foreign policy decisions, as vice president under President Eisenhower in the 1950s.

The issue of the U.S. interregnum has been debated since World War I, when President Wilson feared the international ramifications of a potential changing of the guard. The controversy blew over when Wilson won re-election.

But the 1932 election, at the nadir of the Great Depression, brought the controversy to a head. The then four-month float between presidencies was deemed too long * * *

First, he backpedaled on his promise to kickstart what he thought to be a moribund economy with the fiscal stimulus plan that included spending on new highways, a high-speed rail and a national computer network.

Recent robust gains in chief economic indicators, combined with negative reaction from inflation-sensitive markets, prompted Clinton to rethink his plans.

Then, the Bush administration's report this month of a larger-than-expected federal deficit gave Clinton reason to pull back his celebrated campaign promise of a tax break for the middle class.

He said the deficit is now projected as "$50 billion bigger five years from now than it was thought to be in August and over $100 billion bigger than it was thought to be in the spring when I put together" the Clinton campaign booklet "Putting People First," which proposes the tax cut.

Moreover, his appointed economic staff now favors a hike in the federal gas tax to help offset the deficit.

Last, Clinton has had a sudden change of heart regarding Haitian refugees.

When the Constitution was written in the 18th Century, transportation and communication were so slow that it would have been almost impossible for officials elected in November to reach the capital in shorter time. But, within decades, rail and other new technologies made such a large cushion obsolete.

So, Congress proposed the 20th Amendment, which moved the president's inaugural day to Jan. 20 from March 4. The "lame duck" amendment was ratified in 1933.

But many today think the interval cut didn't go far enough. The advent of electronic media and jet travel calls for a new review, they argue.

In 1981, Sen. Claiborne Pell, D-R.I., and former Sen. Charles Mathias, R-Md., first introduced a bill moving the inauguration date back to Nov. 20 from Jan. 20. A revised bill, moving the date back to Dec. 10 instead, will be reintroduced this week, an aide to Pell said.

"Do we really need 11 weeks to carry out the shift from one president to the next?" asked Schlesinger, a professor at City University of New York.

Bush would answer that with an emphatic "no."

"I've concluded" the visibly weary and sad president said in late November, "that the interregnum is too long."

This White House interim, which combines a Middle East flare-up with a Washington outsider who has no military experience, has enlivened the debate.

"All I can say is, I'm glad they moved it (the inaugural date) up from March," said Richard Brody, a Stanford University political analyst.

At the same time, Brody adds, there are benefits to the existing system.

Yes, he says, some domestic appointments could be sped up, but the new president needs that protracted period to set up a new power base—particularly if the incumbent party is defeated.

The British system moves its defeated prime minister out of 10 Downing Street within days of the election. However, the Parliament maintains a "shadow government" that smooths the transition.

Clinton has tapped—some would say milked—a tacit advantage of the long interregnum policy revision.

Over the roughly 75 days since forcibly returning to that country those fleeing to the U.S. He said it was cold-hearted and sent the wrong message to suffering foreigners.

But now he supports the policy, agreeing that it would place a strain on southern Florida's infrastructure.

At the same time, the long transition has allowed Clinton time to test the political waters, political analysts say it may not be to his advantage in the long run.

"There is an advantage to it, but all the public is seeing is the atmospherics of his policy changes," Brody said. "Middle-class tax cut today. Haitians tomorrow. And something else the next day."

He added, "The press already has the idea that this guy waffles."

While Clinton "revisits" his campaign promises, he may have to revisit his whole promise to focus on domestic issues.

Bush's decree that the U.S. and its allies will no longer issue warnings to Saddam to answer future provocations puts Clinton in the eye of the storm Wednesday.

"I don't think this is the type of world he or his advisers thought they'd inherit," Luddy said. "He will be considerably distracted by world events as soon as he takes office."

LAME DUCKS

1993: Bush-Clinton—Pell-Mathias bill, revised to move the inauguration date to Dec. 10, will be reintroduced.

During transition, Bush orders air strikes on Iraq in response to U.N. violations. Clinton is briefed.

1981: Carter-Reagan—Pell-Mathias bill first introduced. Bill would move inauguration day to Nov. 20.

1968: Johnson-Nixon—Concern over changing party command during Vietnam War a campaign issue.

1933: Hoover-FDR—"Lame Duck" Amendment cut interregnum from four months to 10 weeks.

By Mr. COATS:

S.J. Res. 18. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to limit the terms of office for Members of Congress; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONGRESSIONAL TERM LIMITS

Mr. COATS. Mr. President, I rise today to reintroduce legislation I believe will go a long way toward reforming the Congress and restoring the American people's trust in their institutions of government.

In recent years, the Senate Select Committee on Ethics has become known as the graveyard of investigations. It should be clear to all of us, as it is to the American people, that Congress is incapable of policing itself. Only a nonpartisan outsider can enforce the ethical and legal standards that Americans expect.

For this reason, I am reintroducing legislation to abolish the Ethics Committee and establish an independent commission with authority to appoint outside counsel to review alleged violations of Senate ethics rules. This legislation will end congressional self-policing and provide the Senate with the same kind of scrutiny applied to the executive branch.

Americans not only want their representatives to be more accountable to the law, they want them to be more accountable to the people. The instrument many have chosen to reach this end is term limits. This is another area where Congress must reform itself if it is to deserve public trust.

The overwhelming passage of term-limit initiatives in the 14 States in which they were on the ballot in November is a clear indication of a growing national movement. Indeed, Americans favor limiting the terms of their elected officials by a margin of 2 to 1.

Today, I am reintroducing my bill proposing a constitutional amendment to limit Representatives to six full terms and Senators to two full terms in office. This is a limit. But I believe it would be a source of liberation—the liberation of a Congress that could concentrate on policy, not the demands of a career or the opinions of special interests.

In the aftermath of the recent election, one thing is clear—Americans demand change in the way that Congress does business. That change, to be meaningful, must transform the way Congress polices itself and the way it views the terms and objects of its service. If the Congress wants to recover lost credibility, I believe these two measures are essential.

I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 18

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, to be valid only if ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years after the date of its submission by the Congress:

"ARTICLE—

"SECTION 1. No person may serve any portion of a term as Representative if, taking into account only service on or after the date on which this section takes effect, at the completion of that term the person would have served as a Representative for more than six full terms (not including any part of a partial term to which the person may have been elected or appointed).

"SECTION 2. No person may serve any portion of a term as Senator if, taking into account only service on or after the date on which this section takes effect, at the completion of that term the person would have served as a Senator for more than two full terms (not including any part of a partial term to which the person may have been elected or appointed).

"SECTION 3. This article shall take effect at noon of the first January 3 that occurs more than one year after the date of adoption of this article and on which terms of Representatives begin."

By Mr. AKAKA (for himself and Mr. INOUE):

S.J. Res. 19. A joint resolution to acknowledge the 100th anniversary of the January 17, 1893, overthrow of the Kingdom of Hawaii, and to offer an apology to native Hawaiians on behalf of the United States for the overthrow of the Kingdom of Hawaii; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

THE 100TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE OVERTHROW OF THE KINGDOM OF HAWAII

• Mr. AKAKA. Mr. President, with President Bill Clinton's inauguration yesterday, America embarked on a new beginning filled with hope for its future. For native Hawaiians this is a time of mournful remembrance, however, as this week marks the 100th anniversary of the January 17, 1893, overthrow of the Kingdom of Hawaii's last ruling monarch—Queen Liliuokalani.

The resolution I reintroduce today acknowledges the centennial of the 1893 overthrow, and offers an official apology on behalf of the United States for its complicity in this event. But most importantly, it promotes reconciliation efforts between the United States and the native Hawaiian people.

While this resolution passed the Senate and received broad support from the House during the 102d Congress, it did not reach the House floor before adjournment. Consequently, I am reintroducing this resolution today to continue educating my colleagues on this important event in Hawaii's history which has had a profound impact on my kindred people.

The deprivation of Hawaiian sovereignty which began a century ago has had devastating effects on the health, culture, and society of native Hawaiians, with consequences that are evident throughout the islands today.

Long neglected by the United States, native Hawaiians have literally fallen in the cracks when it comes to Federal policy toward native Americans. Yet history will show that native Hawaiians are indeed descendants of the aboriginal people who, prior to the arrival of the first Westerners in 1778, occupied and exercised sovereignty in the area that now constitutes the State of Hawaii.

History will show that the Kingdom of Hawaii was a highly organized, civilized, and sovereign nation from the unification of the Hawaiian Islands under King Kamehameha I in 1810 until the overthrow of its last monarch, Queen Liliuokalani, in 1893. History will show that for close to 70 years, between 1826 and 1893, the United States recognized the independence of the Kingdom of Hawaii and extended full and complete diplomatic recognition to the Hawaiian Government. History will show that without the active support and intervention by U.S. diplomatic and military representatives, the overthrow of Queen Liliuokalani on January 17, 1893, would have failed for lack of popular support and insufficient arms. In his message to Congress regarding these events, President Grover Cleveland called the overthrow an act of war, committed with the participation of a diplomatic representative of the United States and without authority of Congress, and acknowledged that by such acts the government of a peaceful and friendly nation was overthrown. The acts of villainy that occurred a century ago have never been remedied, and no official apology has ever been made by the United States to the native Hawaiian people.

The resolution I reintroduce today simply seeks to provide the foundation for improved relations between the Federal Government and the native Hawaiian people. With the centennial of the 1893 overthrow, and the inauguration of a new President who promises new hope for native Hawaiians and all Americans, we have at hand an opportunity for reconciliation. •

Whereas the Senate in 1983 and the House of Representatives in 1988 have published well-received guides to these materials; and

Whereas thousands of new entries have been added to the Senate's 1983 edition and supplies of this award-winning reference guide have been exhausted: Now, therefore, be it

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 7—RELATIVE TO IMPACT STATEMENTS ON LEGISLATION

Mr. WALLOP submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

S. CON. RES. 7

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that each committee of the Congress that reports legislation that requires employers to provide new employee benefits shall secure an objective analysis of the impact of the legislation on employment and international competitiveness and include an analysis of the impact in the report of the committee on the legislation.

SENATE RESOLUTION 11—RELATIVE TO BOSNIA-HERCEGOVINA

Mr. DECONCINI (for himself, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. LIEBERMAN, Mr. DOLE, Mr. LUGAR, and Mr. PRESSLER) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. RES. 11

Whereas Bosnia-Herzegovina is a sovereign and independent state, a member of the United Nations, and a participating State of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe;

Whereas the leaders of Bosnia-Herzegovina have committed themselves to practice tolerance and to live together in peace with neighboring states in keeping with the Charter of the United Nations and to promote human rights and democracy pursuant to the Helsinki Final Act;

Whereas the people of Bosnia-Herzegovina have been and remain the target of armed aggression by Serbia and Serbian-backed forces;

Whereas the loss of life and human suffering in Bosnia-Herzegovina has reached an unprecedented scale in post-World War II Europe;

Whereas the war and "ethnic cleansing" in Bosnia-Herzegovina has uprooted more than 1.5 million people, contributing to the largest refugee problem in Europe since World War II;

Whereas the people of Bosnia-Herzegovina have been subjected to organized, systematic, and premeditated war crimes and genocide, including willful killings, rape, forced impregnation, abuse of civilians in detention centers, deliberate attacks on non-combatants, "ethnic cleansing" through forcible expulsion and deportation of civilians, and torture of prisoners;

Whereas the United Nations Security Council has reaffirmed that persons who commit or order the commission of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions are individually responsible in respect to such breaches;

Whereas the International Committee of the Red Cross and other international humanitarian organizations have not been granted unimpeded and continuous access to all camps, prisons and detention centers in Bosnia-Herzegovina as called for by the United Nations Security Council;

Whereas efforts by United Nations humanitarian organizations and others to secure the effective and unimpeded delivery of humanitarian supplies to all victims of the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina have been repeatedly blocked;

Whereas numerous diplomatic efforts to achieve a peaceful solution to the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina have failed to bring about a cessation of hostilities;

Whereas the United Nations Security Council has demanded that neighboring states respect the territorial integrity of Bosnia-Herzegovina;

Whereas irregular forces have failed to disband, disarm, or place their weapons under effective international monitoring;

Whereas Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations provides for the right of individual and collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a member state;

Whereas Bosnia-Herzegovina's right to defend itself against attack by well armed forces has been thwarted by the existing international arms embargo;

Whereas incursions of the airspace of Bosnia-Herzegovina by hostile military aircraft continue to occur in violation of the establishment of a "no-fly" zone by the United Nations Security Council;

Whereas United Nations Security Council resolutions on a "no-fly" zone, the transfer of all heavy weapons to international control, the delivery of humanitarian assistance, and access to all camps, prisons and detention centers in Bosnia-Herzegovina have not been fully implemented or enforced: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the United States should act, without delay, to uphold Bosnia-Herzegovina's right to self-defense as provided for under Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations and to seek the immediate lifting of the international arms embargo as it applies to that country, thus enabling Bosnia-Herzegovina to obtain defensive weapons: Be it further

Resolved, That the United States should assemble a multinational coalition to—

(1) immediately enforce the existing UN "no-fly" zone over the territory of Bosnia-Herzegovina, including through the use of military air force, if required;

(2) ensure that irregular forces in Bosnia-Herzegovina either withdraw, or be subject to the authority of the Government of Bosnia-Herzegovina, or be disbanded and disarmed with their weapons placed under effective international monitoring. In the event that such steps are not taken by irregular forces immediately, every effort, including the use of military air force, should be made to neutralize heavy arms in the hands of such forces;

(3) ensure the immediate, effective and unimpeded delivery of humanitarian aid to all civilian populations in Bosnia-Herzegovina, in keeping with international commitments, including through the use of military force, if required;

(4) ensure unimpeded access to all camps, prisons and detention centers in Bosnia-Herzegovina by the International Committee of the Red Cross and other international humanitarian organizations and facilitate the release of all detainees from such facilities; Be it further

Resolved, That the United States should—

(1) seek an increase in the number of refugees from Bosnia-Herzegovina permitted to enter the U.S. and other European countries; and

(2) work to ensure that those responsible for war crimes and crimes against humanity in Bosnia-Herzegovina are held accountable by an international criminal tribunal.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, is there anyone among us who has looked into the eyes of a Bosnian recently released from a Serbian concentration camp and not choked in horror at the depth of the human tragedy which we and the rest of the world are allowing to continue in Bosnia-Herzegovina today? Listen to the personal accounts of men and women who have been victimized during the course of the war there and you quickly recognize the haunting patterns of genocide.

I traveled to Macedonia and Croatia recently with Representative FRANK MCCLOSKEY where we met with refugees from Bosnia-Herzegovina, including recently released detainees. Their stories document organized, systematic, and premeditated war crimes perpetrated against innocent civilians, including children.

The reports recall willful killings, rape, forced impregnation, abuse of civilians in detention centers, deliberate attacks on noncombatants, ethnic cleansing through forcible expulsion and mass killings, and torture of prisoners. The accounts sound frighteningly familiar, harkening back to the darkest days of Nazi Germany. "War turned into genocide" is the how Bosnian President Alija Izetbegovic recently described the armed aggression and human suffering inflicted on the people of his country.

The bold cries "never again" made in the past have today muted a policy of appeasement which has become grotesque in its hypocrisy.

Elie Wiesel, himself a camp survivor, in accepting the Nobel Peace Prize, said "Neutrality helps the oppressor, never the victim. Silence encourages the tormentor, never the tormented." He continued "Wherever men or women are persecuted because of their race, religion, or political views, that place must—at the moment—become the center of the universe."

Some may take comfort in expressions of outrage, indignation, and disgust. But the horrors of Bosnia have gone on for too long now to make these nothing more than meaningless words.

Our diplomatic negotiations have become simply an exercise in more words. And, words without action equal silence. Our silence can now only add further to the torment of those who once believed in world humanity but now know the horrible reality of our complicity in the living hell they are being subjected to.

For our statements betray how much we do know. We cannot claim ignorance. We cannot take refuge behind places of ignorance this time.

Our failure to act upon our words and commitments equals the type of neutrality which, Wiesel reminds us, helps the oppressors. As if this were not bad enough, we now hear expressions of thanks to an accused war criminal. Thanks for what?

The world community has looked for every excuse not to act decisively. It has engaged in an endless series of talks which we all pray will bring peace but which we know in our hearts are only helping the aggressor unless and until we back up our negotiating rhetoric with force instead of more meaningless words. President Izetbegovic decrying the fact that the world "has done very little, or nothing, close to nothing" to come to his country's aid said "we cannot endure much longer."

While it is too late to save those who have perished, it is not too late to act—to back up our words with action.

The resolution which I introduce today along with Senators D'AMATO, LIEBERMAN, DOLE, and LUGAR is a call to action. It is an attempt to address the most pressing concerns. It is based, in large part, upon elements of resolutions already adopted by the U.N. Security Council and the General Assembly. Resolutions which have not been fully implemented or enforced.

As former Secretary of State George Shultz recently remarked, "resolutions without follow-through are empty threats, and nobody takes them seriously."

Our resolution provides for that much needed followthrough:

The immediate lifting of the international arms embargo as it applies to Bosnia-Herzegovina in keeping with that country's right to self-defense as provided for under article 51 of the charter of the United Nations.

It calls upon the United States to assemble a multinational coalition for the following purposes:

Enforcement of the existing U.N. no-fly zone over the territory of Bosnia-Herzegovina including through the use of military air force, if required.

Ensure that irregular forces in Bosnia-Herzegovina either withdraw, or be subject to the authority of the Government of Bosnia-Herzegovina, or be disbanded and disarmed with their weapons placed under effective international monitoring. In the event that such steps are not taken by irregular forces immediately, every effort, including the use of military air force, should be made to neutralize heavy arms in the hands of such forces.

The immediate, effective, and unimpeded delivery of humanitarian aid to all civilian populations in Bosnia-Herzegovina, in keeping with international commitments including through the use of military force, if required.

Unimpeded access to all camps, prisons, and detention centers in Bosnia-Herzegovina by the International Committee of the Red Cross and other international humanitarian organizations, facilitating the release of all detainees from such facilities.

In addition, it calls upon the United States to:

Seek an increase in the number of refugees from Bosnia-Herzegovina permitted to enter the United States and other European countries.

Work to ensure that those responsible for war crimes and crimes against humanity in Bosnia-Herzegovina are held accountable by an international criminal tribunal.

I urge my colleagues to answer this call to action and lend their support to this resolution.

If we will not act then let us remain truly silent. For more words will only add to the pain, will only add to the suffering. Let history be the judge if we choose to remain neutral, choose to remain silent.

Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. President, I send to the desk the resolution and ask for its proper referral.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield?

Mr. DECONCINI. Yes.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senator from Arizona for his statement, one I concur in fully. I believe the RECORD will reflect I am a sponsor of the resolution.

Mr. DECONCINI. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the Senator for his leadership.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with the Senator from New York and the Senator from Arizona to introduce a resolution, which calls upon the United States and the world community to take decisive action in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

For the past 9 months, we have been witnesses to the greatest systematic violation of basic human rights in more than a generation. Despite worldwide pledges that the atrocities of the holocaust or the Armenian genocide will stand alone and never be repeated, the people of Bosnia-Herzegovina now share a tragic kinship with the survivors of this century's darkest chapters.

The facts are staggering. Wanton killing, rape, violent abuse in detention centers, attacks on innocent Bosnians, torture of prisoners, and of course ethnic cleansing, which is the forced expulsion of civilians from their homelands. The violence has claimed the lives of more than 200,000 citizens. Ethnic cleansing has uprooted more than 1.5 million people, creating a refugee problem of biblical proportions. There appears to be no limit to the degree of violence—the senseless genocide—imposed by Serbia and Serbian-backed forces.

Over the past month, the United Nations has worked diligently to seek a peace agreement among the warring factions. Just yesterday, Bosnian Serbs agreed to a peace plan offered by former Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, and former British Foreign Secretary, Lord Owen. On the surface, the Serbs' approval of the peace plan can be seen as a victory for the people of Bosnia—it represents a movement away from the Serbs' desire to carve a separate, Serb state within the boundaries of Bosnia-Herzegovina.

However, Mr. President, let there be no misunderstanding. Approval of the peace agreement does not end the need for stronger international pressure against the Serbs. There is no ceasefire. Sarajevo is still plagued by sounds of gunfire. Hundreds of thousands of Bosnian Moslems remain displaced from their homelands. Maps of the 10 provinces under the plan have still to be drawn and agreed to by the participants.

At best, we have a commitment to peace. Peace itself remains far off on the horizon.

A strong commitment by the United States and our allies—in concert with the United Nations—to stand with the people of Bosnia is essential if the quest for peace is to remain on track. Furthermore, any peace that is achieved does not mean we let pass the atrocities instigated by Serbian leaders. Peace must not cement tyrannical gains, or reward aggression. Peace must not dismantle rights to self-determination. Peace must not pardon war crimes. Peace is no substitute for justice. They stand hand in hand.

The United States Senate has stood strongly in support of a greater multinational presence to restore order in Bosnia, achieve a peace, and punish the tyrants. Last year, 74 Members of this body approved a resolution I cosponsored, which called for decisive action by the President and the United Nations. I stand here today to urge my colleagues to renew the commitment made last year.

The resolution we are introducing today calls for strong steps to put a stop to Serb aggression. Specifically, it calls for the immediate lifting of the arms embargo as it applies to Bosnia-Herzegovina. It calls for the United States to assemble a multinational coalition to enforce the existing no-fly zone; transfer heavy arms in Bosnia to U.N. control; coordinate the delivery of humanitarian aid; and gain access to detention centers for international relief organizations, such as the Red Cross. It calls on the United States to seek an increase in the number of Bosnian refugees permitted to enter the United States and Europe.

Finally, our resolution calls on this Nation to work to ensure that war criminals are held accountable by an international war crimes tribunal. This last point is absolutely necessary. The United Nations was created in part to uphold international justice. There have been a number of efforts to establish procedural rules and guidelines for an international war crimes tribunal, but they have been unsuccessful. The tragedy in the former Yugoslavia should renew our efforts to establish an international justice system. Recently, I wrote an article that appeared in the Christian Science Monitor that calls for the creation of a war crimes tribunal modeled after the tribunal established in Nuremberg. I ask unanimous consent that a copy of this article appear in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. President, this resolution is no more than a statement of resolve. The ball is in our new President's court. The question of whether real peace will be achieved—one that recognizes the political and human rights of all citizens and ethnic groups within the former Yugoslavia—rests largely with the President. By passing this resolution, we can send a message that the Senate stands behind him in the difficult decisions that face him.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JUSTICE MUST BE DEMANDED FOR "ETHNIC CLEANSING" CRIMES
(By Larry Pressler)

It is hard to recall a time when headlines did not proclaim, virtually on a daily basis, some new war atrocity in the former Yugoslavia. The situation has received extensive debate in the United States Congress, the United Nations, and in other forums, and added "ethnic cleansing" to our vocabulary.

But more questions than answers have resulted from this worldwide deliberation. How long will the war continue? How many more will die or be forced from their homes? Will the newly imposed maritime blockade against Serbia help Bosnians? Will the killing and purging spill over from Bosnia into Kosovo, making ethnic Albanians (90 percent of the population of Kosovo) the next target of Serbian-backed ethnic cleansing?

One vitally important question has not received much attention: Will those guilty of war crimes in the former Yugoslavia eventually be punished? It is not too early to consider this question. An affirmative answer by a unified world community might bring the atrocities to an end. The Bosnian government estimates that more than 40,000 individuals are dead or missing and more than 2 million have been driven from their homes—the greatest tide of refugees in Europe since World War II. Atrocities are reported on both sides, but Serbian atrocities appear to far outweigh those committed by Muslims and Croats.

We must send a strong message that these actions will not go unpunished. On Aug. 11, 1992, the US Senate endorsed such a message by a 74-22 vote. During Senate debate on the resolution, I referred to this as a "defining moment" in US foreign policy. How we handle this situation will tell the world much about America's role in the post-cold-war world.

Among its provisions, the resolution on the former Yugoslavia called for the convening of a war crimes tribunal. On Oct. 6, the UN Security Council adopted Resolution 780, requesting the secretary-general to establish a commission of experts to analyze war crimes information submitted by countries and human rights organizations. The commission also would conduct its own investigations into alleged violations of the Geneva Conventions and other violations of international humanitarian law committed in the former Yugoslavia. The resolution allows the UN secretary-general to recommend "further appropriate steps."

What are further appropriate steps? Perhaps the most famous instance in which individuals were held responsible for war crimes was the Nuremberg Trials. On Aug. 8, 1945, the Allied Powers London Agreement was signed, creating an International Military Tribunal.

The UN General Assembly adopted Resolution 95(1) on Dec. 11, 1946, noting the agreement and annexed charter establishing the tribunal and affirming "the principles of international law recognized by the Charter of the Nuremberg Tribunal and the judgment of the Tribunal." Later, the UN's International Law Commission would formulate seven principles of international war crimes law which evolved from the Nuremberg experience.

Unfortunately, while work has continued in this area over the years, a comprehensive regulation of crimes against peace, war crimes, and crimes against humanity has not yet evolved. This does not mean that the work of the newly created UN Commission of Experts will be in vain. The world can still use the UN to pass judgment on the criminals of the former Yugoslavia.

Another avenue open to a world community seeking justice in the former Yugoslavia may be the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide. The Genocide Convention was first adopted in 1948. Yugoslavia is a signatory to the convention and thus bound by its provisions. The convention defines genocide as the intentional destruction of any national, ethnic, racial, or religious group, in whole or in part, by killing its members, causing them serious physical or mental harm, imposing conditions of life calculated to bring about their physical destruction, imposing measures intended to prevent births, or transferring children from one group to another.

The convention renders punishable the actual commission of any of these acts, as well as conspiracy, incitement, attempt, and complicity in connection with any of them.

How is the convention enforced? The main sanction lies in the undertaking of its parties to enact legislation to implement the convention. Each party is then responsible for providing for the punishment of offenders by national courts of the state within the territory on which the genocide has been committed. However, it is possible for accused individuals to be tried by an international tribunal agreed to by the parties.

Few are yet willing to call what is happening in the former Yugoslavia "genocide" as it is historically understood. However, if the UN Commission of Experts verifies reports of ethnic cleansing and of torture, starvation, and execution in detention camps, it is hard to imagine how such activities would not fall within the scope of activities punishable under the Genocide Convention. In the end, justice must be served for the crimes being committed in the former Yugoslavia.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to join my colleagues, Senators DECONCINI, DOLE, LUGAR, and LIEBERMAN, in submitting a resolution calling for a number of United States actions designed to alleviate the suffering of the Bosnian people and hopefully show the Serbs the futility of further war.

Since April 1992, Serbia has waged a war of annihilation against Bosnia. Before that, it attacked Croatia. Now, menacingly it threatens Kosova. Serbia is unwilling to stop its wars of aggression and stop the killing. Because Serbia will not stop, my colleagues and I are introducing a resolution that urges the following steps: The lifting of the United Nations arms embargo on Bosnia; the enforcement of the no-fly zone over that nation; the use of air power to neutralize the heavy guns of the Serbian forces; the use of force, if necessary to deliver humanitarian supplies; unimpeded access to the Serbian detention camps and prisons; an increase in the number of Bosnian refugees admitted to the United States and European countries; and the convening of a war crimes tribunal to punish all those guilty of the horrible crimes of which we have seen evidence.

Each of these steps are necessary to deter the Serbs from continuing the ethnic cleansing and mass rape that has been the central part of their wars against their neighbors. While they have ravaged Croatia and Bosnia, they must not be allowed to continue or expand their conquests. They must understand that there will be a price for their violence. Their aggression must not go unchecked.

In this light, the Serbs must not be allowed to take their killing machine on the road south into Kosova. Serbia threateningly hovers over Kosova, to make good on its claim of absolute sovereignty over the land—a land that is not theirs. Their acts of harassment, arbitrary arrests, and job dismissals are unjustified acts of occupation. As bad as they are, however, ethnic cleansing in Kosova would be totally unpermissible and should be met with force.

Action must be taken, and I commend my colleagues for putting forth this important resolution. I urge others to join us in trying to stop the bloodshed in Bosnia.

SENATE RESOLUTION 12—RELATIVE TO GATT NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. PRESSLER (for himself, Mr. HEFLIN, and Mr. WALLOP) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

S. RES. 12

Whereas in 1986, negotiations on an international agreement to reform the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (hereafter in this resolution referred to as "GATT") began in Punta del Este, Uruguay, with a targeted conclusion date of December 1990;

Whereas the United States and other major agricultural exporting nations insisted from the start on significant reductions in the subsidy programs operated by the European Community under its Common Agricultural Policy;

Whereas in December 1990, after the European Community decided against reducing the subsidy programs of its Common Agricultural Policy, no international agricultural subsidy reduction agreement was reached;

Whereas in November 1991, the European Community indicated some willingness to reduce its export subsidies during the GATT negotiations;

Whereas in November 1992, the European Community agreed to certain reductions in its export subsidies;

Whereas American agriculture has a long tradition of supporting international efforts to achieve more open markets and fairer rules governing world agricultural trade;

Whereas the support of United States farmers and ranchers for multilateral and other trade negotiations depends on the success of the Uruguay Round GATT negotiations in achieving agricultural subsidy reductions in the European Community; and

Whereas any agreement under the GATT that is not supported by American farmers and ranchers would not be acceptable to the Congress: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that any agreement regarding proposed changes to the GATT must—

(1) achieve the elimination or substantial reduction of export subsidies as a means of disposing of agricultural surpluses in the world market;

(2) achieve new and expanded foreign market opportunities for United States farm products;

(3) ensure the European Community does not offset possible reductions in its agricultural export subsidies by adopting programs, such as variable levies or tariffs, which have the effect of substantially limiting United States agricultural exports to the European Community;

(4) not limit the United States ability to exercise its rights under the GATT to eliminate unfair trade barriers in the future; and

(5) achieve a sound agreement governing sanitary and phytosanitary regulations.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, during the 102d Congress I introduced a resolution to establish U.S. Senate policy that meaningful reforms with respect to agricultural subsidies must be achieved in the GATT negotiations. Today, I join several of my colleagues in reintroducing that resolution.

By meaningful, we mean that any new GATT Agreement must ensure fair trade opportunities for American farmers and ranchers. Growth in exports is the key to a better future for U.S. agriculture. We must expand world market opportunities for U.S. farmers and ranchers.

A new agreement also would shape significantly the future economic growth of the world's developing and lesser developed countries. The concessions afforded those countries could determine their future economic growth and potential for development. This could be significant for the United States, since 40 percent of U.S. agricultural trade is with the world's developing and lesser developed countries. Some of the largest consumers of U.S. farm products once were economically less-developed countries.

Mr. President, the Uruguay round of GATT negotiations to establish new trading rules in agriculture have been focused on three areas: Internal support, market access, and export competition. The arduous negotiations of the past 6 years have resulted in certain agreements being reached, and now the talks are entering their final stretch. If we are to have a successful conclusion to the Uruguay round, the United States must continue to insist that measurable improvements be made in each of these areas.

The Uruguay round originally was scheduled to be concluded in December 1990. At that time, the United States was calling on the European Community [EC] to reduce its domestic agricultural subsidies by 75 percent and its export subsidies by 90 percent over a 10-year period. This demand marked a retreat from the original U.S. position of total elimination of all agricultural subsidies. Still, the EC balked and walked away from the negotiations.

In December 1991, efforts again were made to reach a consensus agreement. Though the United States continued to insist on its modified position, discussion centered on a 36-percent reduction in export subsidies and a 20-percent reduction in domestic subsidies over a 6-year period. Expectations were high and many believed that a breakthrough was near. I was concerned that the United States might back down on some demands simply to reach a new agreement. Fortunately, that did not occur.

Mr. President, at that time, I wrote the President and the U.S. Trade Representative urging them not to back down from our demands that Europe cease to practice agricultural protectionism. No consensus was reached, and GATT Director General Arthur Dunkel proposed a draft final agreement embracing a 36-percent reduction in export subsidies and 20-percent reduction in domestic subsidies over a 6-year period. The so-called Dunkel proposal is now the center of negotiations on agricultural trade in the Uruguay round.

The recent threat of United States retaliation to counter the European Community's GATT-illegal oilseed regime forced some movement on the part of the European Community. The agreements made in November 1992 offered renewed hope for concluding the talks. However, since November, concerns over market access in the European Community for United States agricultural products have been raised. In fact, close examination of the agreements reached to date could actually result in fewer agriculture exports to the EC. Mr. President, this cannot be allowed to happen. I will oppose any GATT rules that hurt American farmers and ranchers.

According to industry sources, elimination of EC agricultural supports, such as variable levies and export subsidies, could boost U.S. farm exports in all markets between $4 and $5 billion, while at the same time reduce U.S. imports about $2 billion. Among key commodities, U.S. grain exports could rise about $1.8 billion, with imports dropping $22 million. Meat and egg exports could increase $1.3 billion, while imports could fall almost $2.4 billion.

Mr. President, the effect of such gains would be substantial. Every billion dollars' worth of agricultural exports means 26,000 new jobs here in the United States.

Allowing the EC to continue its protectionist agricultural subsidy programs means that South Dakota farmers and ranchers would continue to face unfair foreign competition. Every farmer and rancher in South Dakota knows that higher grain, dairy, and meat prices depend on better access to foreign markets. EC export subsidies deprive our farmers and ranchers of billions of dollars in foreign sales.

A new GATT Agreement that meaningfully addresses the problem of EC agricultural subsidies would increase the U.S. share of world export markets in grains and meats. Such an agreement likely would result in little change in Government supports and higher market prices for most U.S. commodities. World prices for most agricultural commodities likely would be higher than under a continuation of current policy. Reducing export subsidies and import barriers would increase world demand. U.S. taxpayers, and U.S. grain, oilseed, and livestock producers, would benefit from meaningful GATT reforms.

Mr. President, the Dunkel proposal submitted in December 1991 does not go far enough. U.S. farmers and ranchers currently are forced to compete on an uneven playing field. It would remain uneven under the Dunkel proposal. Therefore, our negotiators must work to level this playing field by insisting on further concessions from the EC.

The drama of the negotiation process will continue and any final agreement probably will be reached in an 11th-hour deal. Unless a significant reduction in agricultural subsidies—at both the export and domestic levels—is achieved, the Uruguay round of GATT negotiations will be doomed to failure.

SEC. 5. The provisions of this resolution shall take effect on the first day of the first Congress following the date of enactment.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, I am sending forward to the desk this afternoon legislation on behalf of myself and Senators INOUE, DASCHLE, DODD, LUGAR, MCCAIN, PELL, GORTON, SIMON, COHEN, and NUNN.

Yesterday, during President Clinton's inaugural address, he spoke to change. And I think I have just the right remedy that will help us address that, particularly here in the U.S. Senate.

The Republic certainly spoke to its frustration about the process of government in the fall election. And because of that, I am sure reform will be a popular topic in this Congress.

But we must choose our reforms carefully and judge them not by their popularity, but by their benefit to this institution and to the role it plays in the constitutional system. I believe we should focus intently on one goal: to make Members of this body strictly accountable for our choices. We should begin at the most basic level, because tinkering will squander our mandate with little benefit.

For those reasons, this bipartisan group of Senators is introducing—reintroducing, I should say—this fundamental reform that I long have believed essential to strengthening the accountability in this Chamber. We have proposed this far-reaching reform at the budget and appropriations process and committee system in each of the past three Congresses.

So, Mr. President, as you can tell, it has taken a while to get it off the ground. But hope springs eternal here, and I believe this may be just the right opportunity to seize the moment. This year, we believe that the national political climate has underscored the merits and the timeliness of these ideas.

Just briefly, Mr. President, this legislation recognizes or reorganizes the budget and appropriations process and reduces overlapping committee jurisdictions.

Today, the budget cycle begins with the Budget Committee, exerting de facto control over policy priorities in the Senate by drafting and enforcing the budget resolution. The cycle ends with the Appropriations Committee resetting the priorities within the budget parameters. Sandwiched in the middle are the policy committees, whose chairmen and ranking members, despite their policy expertise, have little direct voice in setting overall national priorities. We select leaders, but deny them the power to lead.

Mr. President, without going through all—because of time limitations—of the delineating of this legislation, I do hope, because we have a special commission now in both the House and the Senate delegated to address reform in this the 103d Congress, that this can be something that can provide some parameters and some guidelines for serious discussion.

I think we harbor no illusions that this legislation is perfect. Our intent is to start the debate, and we welcome any proposals our colleagues may have. But we do firmly believe this: The most worthwhile reforms will not be cosmetic, but will seek to improve the Senate's basic work of setting public priorities and allocating public money to achieve them.

If we make ourselves more accountable in that process, I suspect many related problems will resolve themselves.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that a summary of the bill's provisions be included at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE COMMITTEE AND PROCEDURAL REFORM PURPOSE

To revise the Senate committee structure to give leaders of standing committees more influence in setting overall national priorities and to consolidate authorizing and appropriating responsibilities. Also to reduce overlapping committee jurisdictions and bolster the accountability of Senators and committees for fiscal decisions.

A leadership committee will establish national policy priorities. Restructured legislative committees, known as either policy committees or program committees, will be responsible for implementing policy priorities. Each legislative committee will be responsible for authorizations and appropriations for programs, projects, and activities within its jurisdiction.

LEADERSHIP COMMITTEE

The Committee on National Properties

Like the current Committee on the Budget, the Committee on National Properties (leadership committee) will establish overall policy direction for the Senate by setting spending priorities for legislative committees through its jurisdiction over the Budget Act and its responsibility for reporting and enforcing annual budget resolutions.

In contrast to the existing structure, chairmen and ranking minority members of legislative committees will serve on the Committee on National Properties and will, therefore, have direct influence in setting policy priorities and spending levels for the Senate legislative agenda. Broad policy decisions will flow from the leadership level to the legislative level, where they will be transformed into legislative programs.

LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEES

Legislative committees would be of two types: legislative policy committees and legislative program committees.

A. Legislative Policy Committees

Legislative policy committees would have legislative, oversight, and appropriations responsibilities for substantive areas of national policy and for national programs of importance to the Senate. These committees would perform both the authorization and appropriations functions for programs within their jurisdiction. Their exercise of the appropriations function, however, must conform to the national policy decisions of the leadership committee. Legislative policy committees would be:

Committee on Agricultural Policy

The jurisdiction of the Committee on Agricultural Policy would include all existing responsibilities of the Committee on Agriculture, except those relating to nutrition and forest lands.

Those eligible for initial membership on the committee would include current members of the Committee on Agriculture and current members of the Subcommittee on Agriculture, Rural Development, and Related Agencies of the Committee on Appropriations.

Committee on Commercial Policy

The jurisdiction of the Committee on Commercial Policy would include all existing responsibilities of the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation except those relating to interoceanic canals. It also would have responsibility for highway programs and for regional economic development.

Those eligible for initial membership on the committee would include current members of the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation and the Subcommittee on Transportation and Related Agencies of the Committee on Appropriations.

Committee on Defense Policy

The jurisdiction of the Committee on Defense Policy would include all existing responsibilities of the Committee on Armed Services.

Those eligible for initial membership on the committee would include current members of the Committee on Armed Services and the Subcommittee on Defense and on Military Construction of the Committee on Appropriations.

Committee on Economic Policy

The jurisdiction of the Committee on Economic Policy would include all areas relating to revenue and bonded debt currently under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Finance and all areas relating to banking, monetary policy, coinage, and the Federal Reserve currently under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

Those eligible for initial membership on the committee would include current members of the Committee on Finance, the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, and the Committee on the Budget.

Committee on Energy Policy

The jurisdiction of the Committee on Energy Policy would include all current responsibilities of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources except those relating to national parks, wilderness lands, historical lands in general, public lands, and territorial possessions of the United States.

Those eligible for initial membership on the committee would include current members of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources and the Subcommittee on Energy and Water Development of the Committee on Appropriations.

Committee on Environmental Policy

The jurisdiction of the Committee on Environmental Policy would include current Committee on the Environment areas of jurisdiction except those relating to highways, public buildings, public works, and regional economic development. In addition, the committee would have responsibility for forest lands, public lands, national parks, and historical and scenic areas.

Those eligible for initial membership on the committee would include current members of the Committee on the Environment and the Subcommittee on Interior and Related Agencies of the Committee on Appropriations.

Committee on Foreign Policy

The jurisdiction of the Committee on Foreign Policy would include all current areas of responsibility of the Committee on Foreign Relations plus responsibility for foreign trade, including reciprocal trade agreements, export promotion and export controls, interoceanic canals, territorial possessions and trusteeships of the United States, and U.S. nuclear export policy.

Those eligible for initial membership on the committee would include current members of the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Subcommittee on Foreign Operations of the Committee on Appropriations.

Committee on Governmental Policy

The jurisdiction of the Committee on Governmental Policy would include all areas currently under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Governmental Affairs, plus responsibility for renegotiation of government contracts, public buildings, and improved grounds of the United States.

Those eligible for initial membership on the committee would include current members of the Committee on Governmental Affairs, plus members of the Subcommittee on Treasury, Postal Service, and General Government of the Committee on Appropriations.

Committee on Judicial Policy

The jurisdiction of the Committee on Judicial Policy would include all current responsibilities of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Those eligible for initial membership on the committee would include current members of the Committee on the Judiciary and the Subcommittee on Commerce, State, Justice, and Related Agencies of the Committee on Appropriations.

Committee on Social Policy

The jurisdiction of the Committee on Social Policy would include all current responsibilities of the Committee on Labor and Human Resources except the discretionary spending programs under the Older Americans Act, plus responsibility for nutrition programs, including school nutrition and food stamp programs, public and private housing, Social Security and railroad retirement, and health programs under the Social Security Act.

Those eligible for initial membership on the committee would include current members of the Committee on Labor and Human Resources and the Subcommittee on Labor, Health and Human Services, Education, and Related Agencies of the Committee on Appropriations.

B. Legislative Program Committees

Legislative program committees would have legislative, oversight, and appropriations responsibilities for specific program areas of national concern. These committees would perform both the authorization and appropriations functions for programs within their jurisdiction. Their exercise of the appropriations function, however, must conform to the national program decisions of the leadership committee. Legislative program committees would be:

Committee on Native American Programs

The jurisdiction of the Committee on Native American Programs would include all existing responsibilities of the Select Committee on Indian Affairs. The committee would become a standing committee.

The initial membership on the committee would be composed of all current members of the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

Committee on Veteran American Programs

The jurisdiction of the Committee on Veteran American Programs would include all existing responsibilities of the Committee on Veterans Affairs.

The initial membership of the committee would be composed of all current members of the Committee on Veterans Affairs.

Committee on Senior American Programs

The jurisdiction of the Committee on Senior American Programs would include all existing responsibilities of the Special Committee on Aging, plus legislative responsibility for all discretionary spending programs under the Older Americans Act. The committee would become a standing committee.

The initial membership of the committee would be composed of all current members of the Special Committee on Aging.

Committee on Entrepreneurial American Programs

The jurisdiction of the Committee on Entrepreneurial American Programs would include all existing responsibilities of the Committee on Small Business.

The initial membership of the committee would be composed of all current members of the Committee on Small Business.

ADMINISTRATIVE COMMITTEES

Administrative committees have basically nonlegislative functions. The chairmen and ranking members of administrative committees would not serve on the leadership committee—unless such service should happen to be as an at-large member.

Committee on Senate Rules

Serves the same function as the Committee on Rules and Administration, with members drawn from that committee.

Committee on Senate Ethics

Serves the same function as the Committee on Ethics, with members drawn from that committee.

Committee on Intelligence

Serves the same function as the Committee on Intelligence, with members drawn from that committee.

COMMITTEE CHAIRMEN

Chairman and ranking-member status would be based on seniority, as would the integration of the entire membership of each new committee. Those selected to chair legislative committees would, consistent with provisions of the rules of the Senate allowing for election of committee chairmen, be the senior-ranking chairman and ranking member of the merged committees and subcommittees forming each new committee.

COMMITTEE ASSIGNMENTS

Leadership Committee

All chairmen and ranking members of legislative policy committees and legislative program committees would automatically be accorded membership on the leadership committee. In addition, a specified number of members of the Senate at large would be appointed to the committee to bring party balance on the committee to correspond with party balance in the Senate.

Legislative Policy Committees

Committee assignments would be based on prior committee service with members allowed to select the committees on which they desire to serve, subject to the limitations below and to the maximum committee membership limitation of 17 senators for each legislative policy committee.

Legislative Program Committees

Committee assignments would be based on prior committee service with the membership of predecessor committees transferring in total to each new legislative program committee.

COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP LIMITATIONS

Members could serve on no more than two legislative policy committees. Service on either a legislative program committee or an administrative committee would not limit a member's ability to serve on any other committee.

SENATE RESOLUTION 24—PROSECUTION FOR CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY IN BOSNIA-HERZEGOVINA

Mr. DANFORTH (for himself and Mrs. KASSEBAUM) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. RES. 24

Whereas mass rapes of Bosnian women at the hands of the Serbs is now taking place in the former Yugoslavia;

Whereas the United Nations Security Council cited "massive, organized and systematic detention and rape" when it unanimously voted to condemn "atrocities committed against women, particularly Muslim women, in Bosnia and Herzegovina" on December 18, 1992;

Whereas this behavior comports with the Serbian policy of "ethnic cleansing", the most sadistic and genocidal violence to infect Europe since World War II;

Whereas rape, humiliation, starvation and murder have been inflicted on Muslim girls as young as seven years old;

Whereas the press reports the existence of Serbian "rape camps" in Bosnia with up to 100 prisoners;

Whereas the Nuremberg International Military Tribunal (IMT) held that, for purposes of international criminal law, the individual is a subject of international law;

Whereas the IMT also held that "international law imposes duties and liabilities upon individuals as well as upon states. . . .";

Whereas the 1907 Hague regulations, the 1929 Geneva Convention, and the Genocide Convention establish crimes against humanity as punishable international crimes whether or not committed in execution of a crime against peace or a war crime; and

Whereas the 1949 Geneva Conventions and subsequent protocols designate certain aggravated breaches as universal and extraditable offenses within the criminal jurisdiction of each contracting party: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate hereby—
(1) declares its desire that criminal proceedings, under the principle of universality, be brought against all persons suspected of responsibility for war crimes and crimes against humanity, including mass rape, in Bosnia; and

(2) calls on all parties to the applicable international conventions—

(A) to identify alleged offenders of crimes against humanity, including mass rape, in Bosnia; and

(B)(i) to submit such offenders for prosecution before its own courts; or

(ii) to extradite them to another contracting party or an international tribunal, if the requesting party has jurisdiction and sufficient grounds for prosecution.

• Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, war in the Balkans has involved some of the most sadistic and genocidal violence to infect Europe since World War II. Now the press reports a new crime against humanity: the perpetration of mass rapes of Muslim women. Some are as young as 7 years old.

The U.N. Security Council voted to condemn "atrocities committed against women, particularly Muslim women in Bosnia and Herzegovina" on December 18, 1992.

The Senate must also go on record condemning this new and grotesque dimension to the policy of ethnic cleansing.

The Senate should declare its desire that criminal proceedings be brought against all persons suspected of responsibility for war crimes against humanity, including mass rape in Bosnia.

It is time for all parties to commit to the identification of alleged offenders of crimes against humanity, including mass rape, in Bosnia and to agree to prosecute them or extradite them to those willing and able to do so.

I have therefore introduced, on behalf of myself and Senator KASSEBAUM a resolution urging criminal prosecution of persons committing such crimes. I hope it will be acted upon expeditiously by the Senate.●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

CATHOLIC RELIEF SERVICES' 50TH ANNIVERSARY

• Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I rise today to bring to our colleagues' notice the 50th anniversary of Catholic Relief Services, one of the world's finest and most effective organizations bringing food, medicine, education and, most of all, hope for the people of the developing world.

Founded in 1943 by the Catholic Bishops of the United States, and now maintaining its headquarters in Baltimore, Catholic Relief Services has grown to become the second largest international relief and development agency in the United States. It maintains offices in 43 of the world's poorest countries and funds projects in 31 other countries.

Moving beyond providing free food and emergency relief services, Catholic Relief Services has been in the forefront of developing strategies and methods to help attain sustainable development. Working to build the capacity of indigenous organizations, Catholic Relief Services provides funding, guidance and support to help people respond to the development needs within their own communities.

Mr. President, on Monday, January 25, the Most Reverend James A. Griffin, president and chairman, and the board of directors of Catholic Relief Services will celebrate the 50th anniversary of the founding of this outstanding organization. The principal celebrant of the Liturgy will be the Most Reverend William H. Keeler, Archbishop of Baltimore and president of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops and the U.S. Catholic Conference.

I ask that a brief history of Catholic Relief Services, whose apt motto is "Giving Hope to a World of Need," be printed in the RECORD.

The history follows:

CATHOLIC RELIEF SERVICES

Catholic Relief Services (CRS) was founded in 1943 by the Catholic Bishops of the United States to assist the poor and disadvantaged outside this country. The plight of war refugees was the first mission of the newly created organization, in those days known as War Relief Services.

By the mid-1950s, the role of CRS began to expand. The U.S. Government was beginning to allocate surplus food for distribution to the needy in the Third World, and CRS became involved in the distribution chain. Through special programs, CRS used this surplus U.S. food to expand its assistance to the poor. By the end of the 1950s, CRS had programs in 55 countries.

While working to provide immediate relief assistance in the Third World, CRS began to look for ways to assure a better future for those it served. Without hope, CRS staff knew that the lives of the poor would never improve. They would remain trapped in the cycle of poverty.

This philosophy to bring change, to provide more than just free food, became the driving force behind the agency. CRS believed that development could bring lasting solutions to the problems that had left so many of the world's poor on the brink of disaster. But finding the ways to ensure development meant taking risks, and CRS accepted the challenge.

The agency has been in the vanguard of those developing the methods to break through the barriers to sustainable development. Since this is key for CRS, the agency is working to build the capacity of indigenous organizations, particularly within the structure of the Catholic Church, to respond to the emergency and development needs within their own community.

Today, in a continuing effort to discharge its trust on behalf of the poorest of the poor, CRS expends more than $260 million annually. It is the second largest international relief and development agency in the United States, and it maintains offices in 43 of the world's poorest countries. In addition, CRS funds projects in 31 other countries.

Financial support for CRS comes from diverse sources. The largest are private individuals, groups, corporations and foundations; followed by the United States Government; international organizations; and foreign governments. Support also comes in many forms. Cash and commodities are the largest, but CRS also receives medicines and other items.

CRS is administered by a Board of Bishops selected by the U.S. Bishops, and is staffed by men and women committed to the Catholic Church's apostolate of helping those in need. •

CELEBRATING D.W. NEWCOMER'S SONS 100 YEARS OF SERVICE

• Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I rise today to offer congratulations to D.W. Newcomer's Sons as they celebrate their 100-year anniversary of service to Kansas City. There are very few businesses in Kansas City that can boast of such a high standard of service. The care and concern shown by the Newcomer's has long been a trademark.

Family owned businesses are part of the foundation of the commerce that has put the United States on top. The attention that the Newcomer's Sons shows to the citizens of Kansas City both professionally and privately has earned them a prestigious reputation. I have known the Newcomers to be one of the fine corporate citizens in Kansas City. Kansas Citizens are justifiably proud of the tradition Newcomers has set. I wish D.W. Newcomer's Sons continued success for the next 100 years. •

ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE 1993 CONGRESS—BUNDESTAG STAFF EXCHANGE

• Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, since 1983, the United States Congress and the West German Parliament, the Bundestag, have conducted an annual exchange program in which staff members from both countries observe and learn about the workings of each other's political institutions and convey the views of members from both sides on issues of mutual concern.

This exchange program is one of several sponsored by both public and private institutions in the United States and Germany to foster better understanding of the institutions and policies of each country.

This year will mark the third exchange with a reunified Germany and a parliament consisting of members from both the East and West. Ten staff members from the United States Congress will be selected to visit Germany from April 26 to May 7. They will spend most of the time attending meetings conducted by members of the Bundestag, Bundestag party staffers, and rep-representatives of political, business, academic, and media institutions. They also will spend a weekend in the district of a Bundestag member.

A comparable delegation of German staff members will come to the United States in late June for a 3-week period. During the Fourth of July recess, they will attend similar meetings here in Washington and visit the districts of Members of Congress.

The Congress-Bundestag Exchange is highly regarded in Germany. Accordingly, U.S. participants should be experienced and accomplished Hill staffers so that they can contribute to the success of the exchange on each side of the Atlantic. The Bundestag sends senior staffers to the United States and a number of them take time to meet with the U.S. delegation. The United States endeavors to reciprocate.

Applicants should have a demonstrable knowledge of European events. Applicants need not be working in the field of foreign affairs, although such a background can be helpful. The composite United States delegation should exhibit a range of expertise in issues of mutual concern to Germany and the United States, such as, but not limited to trade, security, the environment, immigration, economic development, health care, and other social policy issues.

In addition, U.S. participants are expected to help plan and implement the program for the Bundestag staffers when they visit the United States.

Participants should expect to assist with the planning of topical meetings in Washington. In addition, they are expected to host one or two staff people in their Member's district over the Fourth of July, or arrange for such a visit in another Member's district.

Participants will be selected by a committee composed of U.S. Information Agency personnel and past participants of the exchange.

Senators and Representatives interested in having members of their staff apply for participation in this year's program should advise them to submit only a résumé and cover letter in which they state why they believe they are qualified, the positive contributions they will bring to the delegation, and some assurances of their ability to participate during the time stated. Applications may be sent to Bob Maynes or Bill Fessler, Officer of Senator DENNIS DECONCINI, 328 Hart Building, by Monday, February 15.●

TRIBUTE TO MIKE HALLORAN, DEDICATED HIBERNIAN

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to honor a man who, like so many others who came to this country, gave up his homeland for an unknown prospect. Mike Halloran came to this country from Clonbur, County Galway, Ireland, in 1956.

Soon after his arrival in the United States, Mike Halloran began working for AT&T, where he continues to work after 36 years. He is married to the former Maureen Armstrong of Cloonacool, County Sligo, Ireland. They have resided in Woodlawn, NY, for 22 years, where they have raised four fine sons.

Mike Halloran has been a member of the Ancient Order of Hibernians, Bronx County Division 7, for the past 12 years. For the past 3 years, as president, he has proudly and honorably served the Ancient Order of Hibernians. He has been devoted to the betterment of mankind, which sets an example for others.

Irish immigrants have gone on to become noted artists, scientists, authors, businessmen, engineers, public officials, and regular, hard-working Americans. I am extremely proud of the contributions made by the children of Ireland and their descendants to this great country. Mike Halloran is one of many great Irish people to serve this country.

I call upon my colleagues to rise with me today and praise Mike Halloran, who has set an example for all who become involved in the community. I salute Mike Halloran and his family for their efforts and commitment to the Ancient Order of Hibernians, Bronx County Division 7.●

THE HARD CHOICE

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, the road to economic recovery is marked by hard choices. As a new administration arrives in Washington, one of the most difficult issues it will confront will be whether to endorse a short-term increase in deficit spending to stimulate the economy.

At last month's economic conference in Little Rock, those advocating fiscal stimulus at the expense of deficit reduction seemed to hold the upper hand. Nevertheless, as a Chicago Tribune editorial later observed, a few strong voices urged a more long-term view. For example, economist Henry Aaron of the Brookings Institute has called the deficit a "slow, wasting disease," one that little by little eats away at the economic foundation of our Nation. For Aaron, fiscal stimulus must be linked to economic discipline. As he says, "Any new Government programs should be paid for by cutting spending or raising taxes, not by borrowing."

I am heartened by recent reports that the new administration plans to press forward with a deficit reduction package. The truth of the matter is that we no longer have the luxury of continuing our profligate ways. As the Tribune editorial rightly concludes, it is time to make the difficult decision—"to concentrate on long-term problems, especially reducing the deficit."

I ask that the Chicago Tribune editorial be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

CLINTON GETS ONE CLEAR DEFICIT WARNING

Economics, someone once said, is the study of choice. Unfortunately, it doesn't spell out what to choose; it merely helps you understand the consequences of your choices.

In his two-day national economic conference, President-elect Clinton showed off his knowledge of public policy issues and got an earful of advice and recommendations from a diverse, impressive array of economists, business leaders and social activists.

If Clinton has made up his mind on the details of the economic plan he'll present to Congress next month, he didn't let on. But he was refreshingly candid in conceding that he faces difficult choices.

One of the hardest will be whether to try to stimulate economic growth in the short run, even if it means increasing the federal budget deficit.

"This is a very tough call," he said. "This is the major economic policy decision we're going to have to make. What we have to decide is what to do, how much and when."

As in most of the conference of more than 320 handpicked participants, Clinton heard from sympathetic supporters, many of whom helped shape the broad outlines of the candidate's economic plan.

Economist James Tobin said he favors a $60 billion program of tax cuts and increased government spending in the first year to ensure greater job creation. Forget about reducing the deficit for two years, he said. Allan Sinai, a Wall Street economist, said he would start a stimulus program "right away," although he favors a package of just $20 billion to $30 billion so as not to roil the financial markets.

Yet there are many economists, most of whom weren't invited to Little Rock, who argue there's no need for short-term stimulus. With the economy showing increasing signs of a gradual recovery, an attempt to jump-start growth now could be damaging.

No one told Clinton he shouldn't do it, but Henry Aaron came the closest. The Brookings Institution economist advised the president-elect to wait until he had seen the number of December unemployment and fourth-quarter economic growth; then, he said, any short-term stimulus should be "small or shelved."

The top priority, Aaron correctly pointed out, should be reducing the deficit, which he labeled a "slow, wasting disease" that will reduce the nation's wealth by $2.5 trillion over the next decade if it isn't addressed. Then Aaron went further: "Any new government programs should be paid for by cutting other spending or raising taxes, not by borrowing."

If only for Aaron's comments, the summit was worth the cheerleading and puffery. Now it's up to Clinton to make the hard choice—to concentrate on long-term problems, especially reducing the deficit.●

OPPORTUNITY HOUSING PROJECT, PUTNAM COUNTY, IN

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I rise today to honor the Opportunity Housing project of Putnam County, IN, and its leader, Charles Dana Chandler.

Several years ago, community leaders in Putnam County realized that the county faced a problem of inadequate low-income housing. The primary concern was for the single-parent family with an entry level income and two or more children.

In June 1989, concerned citizens of Putnam County formed a nonprofit organization called Opportunity Housing that dedicated itself to developing 50 rental properties for low-income families in Putnam County.

With a volunteer staff and funding from local businesses, charities and individuals, the program helped to stabilize the housing of area poor, freeing up their resources for other necessities. By the close of this past year, Opportunity Housing had developed 50 safe and affordable rental units for disadvantaged families.

The Opportunity Housing Program and its leader, Mr. Chandler, are to be commended for their initiative and diligence in taking responsibility for the needs of their community. Opportunity Housing, Inc. can serve as a shining example for other communities seeking to improve housing opportunities throughout the country.●

MORTON GROVE'S SANDY AND HOLLY GAIL

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I am pleased to note that two of my constituents were recently honored for their tireless efforts on behalf of State of Israel Bonds. They are Sanford "Sandy" and Holly Gail of Morton Grove, IL, a suburb of Chicago.

They were presented a special award at a State of Israel Bonds brunch held on November 8, 1992, at the Northwest Suburban Jewish Congregation [NSJC] in Morton Grove, where Sandy serves as president. Over $226,000 was raised for Israel Bonds at the brunch.

Representing Israel Bonds was Dr. Michael Bar-Zohar, a former member of the Israeli Parliament and a current member of the Israeli Labor Party Central Committee. Among his many accomplishments is a three-volume biography of David Ben-Gurion.

The Gails are active and accomplished members of their community. Sandy is a member of the board of governors of the State of Israel Bonds effort in Chicago. He is a member of Israel Bonds' Prime Minister's Club, NSJC Men's Club board and the North Suburban Synagogue council. He also serves on the Environmental Commission of the village of Morton Grove, IL. Sandy is a graduate of the University of Illinois-Urbana and a certified public accountant. He also received a juris doctor degree from Chicago's De Paul University and master of laws in taxation degree from John Marshall Law School, also located in Chicago. He is a partner in the Chicago law firm of Bell, Boyd & Lloyd.

Holly is a past president of the NSJC Sisterhood and has also served as its circle vice president and hospitality vice president. While serving as the sisterhood president, she also held the position of chairperson of the congregation's school board. She is a long-time member of the congregation's board of trustees and has served on various synagogue committees. She has a long record of leadership on behalf of State of Israel Bonds. She is a graduate of Chicago's Roosevelt University and today manages a clothing store.

Their son, Larry, 22, is a recent honors graduate of the University of Illinois-Urbana and plans to study at Hebrew University in Jerusalem in 1993 before entering law school. Their daughter, Michelle, 20, a past Israel Bonds ambassador's ball presentee, a junior at Stanford University, is currently studying at Stanford's overseas campuses in Florence, Italy and Oxford, UK.

Again, my sincerest congratulations to Sandy and Holly for their efforts on behalf of State of Israel Bonds and their Morton Grove community.●

SUPPORTING THE RIGHT OPPOSITION GROUPS IN IRAN AND IRAQ

● Mr. MCCAIN. Mr. President, we have an enduring commitment to encourage democracy and human rights throughout the world. We also cannot ignore the fact that both Iraq and Iran are major potential threats to a region with 60 percent of the world's proven oil reserves, and because of that, to the world's economic stability and world peace.

At this point in time, Iraq is still dominated by a vicious dictator who has proven his lack of concern for his own people on countless occasions, who has invaded a friendly neighbor whose assistance kept his regime alive during the Iran-Iraq war, and who forced the United Nations and the United States into the first major conflict of the post-cold-war era. He is daily using force against Iraq's Shi'ite population in the south, and his military forces present a constant threat to Iraq's Kurds in the North. His regional military ambitions are not ended and he continues to struggle to preserve the capability to deploy weapons of mass destruction.

The situation in Iran is only marginally better. The replacement of Khomeini by Rafsanjani has brought a pragmatist to power and not a moderate. Iran does preserve some elements of democracy and the rule of law, and has allowed its citizens more commercial freedom than Iraq. There are some indicators that a policy of encouraging normal civilian trade and diplomatic relations could encourage these positive trends.

But, we can have no illusions. Iran has taken aggressive steps to dominate the islands in the gulf. It continues to produce chemical weapons, and develop biological and nuclear weapons. It has acquired long-range missiles from North Korea. It is seeking to rebuild modern military forces, and has bought submarines from Russia and antiship missiles from the PRC in an effort to expand its ability to threaten the flow of oil in the gulf.

Iran is still guilty of constant abuse of human rights. It does not permit many forms of legitimate political dissent. Its use of "Islamic Law" abuses Islam and the rule of law, and cannot be separated from the growing corruption of its clergy. Iran has encouraged racial and religious conflict in the Sudan. It is operating in Somalia. It is encouraging religious violence in nations like Egypt, Lebanon, and Algeria.

There is no question that we have every ethical, moral, and strategic reason to encourage Iraqi and Iranian democratic movements, to halt the arms buildup in Iraq and Iran, and to do everything we can to pressure Iraq and Iran to adopt the rule of law and protect the human rights of all their citizens.

This said, it still is not true that the "enemy of our enemy is our friend." This may be a Middle Eastern proverb, but political wisdom has scarcely proved proverbial during the history of the Middle East. We must not fall into the trap of taking sides between authoritarian movements, or confusing the loser in the violent quarrels between extremists in Iraq or Iran with the defenders of democracy and human rights.

Anyone can use the rhetoric of democracy. Anyone can hide behind the flag of human rights. Anyone can attempt to exploit our opposition to the current regimes in Iraq and Iran, and our ethical and moral beliefs. This is particularly true in two countries filled with political, ethnic, and religious turmoil and without real democratic traditions. It is particularly true because Iran is actively arming and encouraging Iraqi groups that oppose Saddam Hussein, and Saddam Hussein is actively arming Iranian groups that oppose Rafsanjani.

We must be extremely careful not to support terrorism in the name of antiterrorism, Iranian or Iraqi front groups in the name of democracy, or extremist opposition groups in the name of human rights. We must not take sides between factions, and we must not encourage violence in the name of democracy.

This is why I have written William Sessions, the Director of the FBI asking for an update of a 1987 report that I received from Senate security on the People's Mujahedin of Iran [PMOI].

This group has become a major lobbying group. It has lobbied members of this body and the House. It has lobbied the President elect and his wife. It has conducted funding raising efforts throughout the United States, and it is actively lobbying members of the Iranian-American community.

The report I have received, however, raises serious questions about the real nature of the PMOI. It indicates that the PMOI is derived from a violent left wing group that carried out the assassination of American officers and civilians in Iran before the fall of the Shah. Similarly, a recent report by the Congressional Research Service raises similar questions about the PMOI. The State Department refuses to meet with this group because of its heritage of extremism.

I am not going to take sides in Iranian or Iraqi politics, nor do I intend to become involved in the complex infighting between Iranian groups in exile. I do believe, however, that we must not start the new Clinton administration with a new Iranate. This body must not become the tool of any political group that can accurately be charged with any of the following heritage, belief, or actions:

Attacks on American citizens, other foreigners, and Iranian citizens and officials during the time of the Shah.

Involvement in a civil war in which it took a strong anti-American and anti-Western stance, was a more extreme leftwing movement than Iran's Tudeh Communist Party, and regularly used terrorism and assassination during the struggle for power following the Shah.

Involvement in a Saddam Hussein funded and supported military movement attacking Iran during the Iran-Iraq War, and in maintaining such a military movement on Iraqi soil during and after the invasion of Kuwait.

Continuing involvement in a low level struggle of terrorism and counterterrorism with the Rafsanjani government in Iran.

Continuing to accept funds, support, bases, and arms from the Saddam Hussein government in Iraq.

Soliciting political support and funds from the Congress, American citizens, and Iranian exiles on United States soil under the guise of being a democratic coalition and human rights advocate when it remains an extreme leftist group whose secret agenda opposes American values and the security of Israel.

The only way that any or all of these charges can be resolved is for the FBI to provide an unclassified report that comprehensively addresses each of these points. Listening to Iranian political groups, however, well meaning, can only reiterate the claims, charges, and countercharges regarding the PMOI. I do not intend to become involved in such a debate, and I encourage my colleagues to avoid it.

If the FBI finds that the PMOI is innocent on all the above counts, then it deserves our support as a legitimate democratic movement. It should be free of the kind of indirect charges made by the State Department and other executive agencies, that do not provide formal charges, but indicate that it may be associated with Iraq, with violence, with attacks on Americans, and with terrorism. No group operating in American politics should be forced to live in limbo, or in a climate where U.S. officials informally criticize it, if it is innocent.

If the facts are uncertain, then the Congress, the American people, the media, and Iranian exiles in America deserve to know the truth about such uncertainties, and make their own judgments.

If the PMOI is guilty of any or all of these charges, then we must not treat it as a legitimate opposition to Iran's current government until it has fundamentally changed its character and leadership.

Mr. President, I will ask permission to include the reply I receive from the FBI in the RECORD as soon as I receive it. I now ask unanimous consent that the 1987 report I received from Senate Security, the Congressional research report on the PMOI, and several letters and newspaper articles relating to this issue be printed in the RECORD following my remarks. I also encourage members to directly contact Senate security for further data on these issues.

Mr. President, I also wish to point out that an important precedent is involved here. We must never do anything to abridge the First amendment rights of any group, foreign or domestic. We must continue the struggle for democracy and human rights. We must encourage and support every group that truly advocates freedom and the rule of law that opposes any regime that denies such progress, whether it is Iran, Iraq, or anywhere else in the world.

But, Mr. President, we cannot afford to have a situation where groups can lobby Congress and the American people in the name of democracy, human rights, freedom, and the rule of law whose true nature is very different or who have undisclosed ties to foreign governments, those who use violence, and those who use terrorism. We cannot afford to allow such groups to raise funds in the United States without the Congress and the American people knowing their true nature.

We have strong rules designed to deal with this situation by requiring Americans who lobby for foreign countries to register with the U.S. Government. At the same time, we lack a mechanism that requires the State Department and FBI to maintain a list of groups with suspect ties to foreign governments, movements with a history of attacking United States and other nationals, movements with ties to military or terrorist movements, or which covertly advocate violence, extremist ideologies, or which otherwise use the first amendment in ways that abuse the very causes they claim to defend.

This is also a case where the Executive branch cannot hide behind the need for national security. First, it is possible to summarize the results of U.S. Government investigations without disclosing sensitive sources and methods. We have seen this confirmed in countless government reports which provide such data when it is convenient to support a given policy or program.

Second, groups which really defend the causes we believe in deserve to be free of indirect charges or innuendo. We must never cloud the reputation of any group with indirect charges that cannot be answered or justified.

Third, we are already living in a postcold war era filled with groups with conflicting agendas that all use the rhetoric of the postcold war era, but many of which repackage themselves without having forsworn violence, extremism, or attacks on the things we believe in. We must be able to distinguish the true nature of foreign groups, or groups with foreign ties, if we are to support the groups that really do advocate freedom and human rights, we must know the nature of the wolves who wear freedom's flag.

Mr. President, let me conclude by asking President Clinton to examine this issue as he takes office, and to charge the Director of the FBI and his new Secretary of State with examining this issue, and either providing immediate unclassified reporting on such groups or recommendations as to what new laws may be required to deal with this issue.

Let me also urge my colleagues to be extremely careful in dealing with groups like the PMOI until the facts are known and the record is clear, and American human rights groups to pay as careful attention to foreign political organizations as they do to the abuses of foreign governments.

U.S. SENATE.

Washington, DC, December 15, 1992.

William S. Sessions,
Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SESSIONS: I am concerned that the People's Mujahedin-E-Khalq is playing an active role in lobbying the U.S. Congress, and in presenting its views on Iran, under conditions where members have no way to learn the history of this organization. I am particularly concerned with its history of violence against American citizens, its role in terrorism, and its financial ties to Iraq.

Back in 1987, the FBI developed an open source review of this group which provides strong indications that the People's Mujahedin-E-Khalq is a terrorist movement that has participated in the assassination of American citizens and receives most of its funds from Iraq. I have attached a copy of the report to this letter.

I would be grateful if you could have your staff review this report, and provide me with an updated version that could be circulated to members of the Senate and House. If possible, I would like to have such an update no later than January 15, 1993, so that the report could be circulated to members of the new Congress when it comes back into session.

Sincerely,

JOHN MCCAIN,
U.S. Senator.

PRINCIPAL FINDINGS

Mujahedin-E-Khalq (MEK) is an Islamic, left-wing organization which became the leading opponent of the Khomeini regime in Iran by 1981. It has won increasing support from Iranians who are dissatisfied with the Shia fundamentalist policies of the Islamic Republic of Iran.

Founded in 1963 by disaffected young members of the Liberation Movement of Iran, the MEK began terrorist operations within Iran in mid-1971 with efforts to disrupt the Shah's celebration of the 2500 year anniversary of the Persian monarchy.

Although the MEK played an important role during the upheaval that brought Khomeini to power, the clerics consistently excluded them from a political role after the revolution. In mid-1980 MEK leaders responded by gradually increasing pressure against the Khomeini regime and in May 1981, launched a violent campaign to subvert the regime.

Led by Massaud Rajavi, the MEK formed a partnership with exiled Iranian president Bani Sadr, and developed the National Council of Resistance (NCR). The NCR functioned basically as a government in exile—it coordinated military operations in northwest Iran, orchestrated political and diplomatic missions, recruited new members, and solicited funding and weapons.

Currently headquartered in Baghdad, Iraq, the MEK include approximately 10,000 well-armed and highly disciplined soldiers and has shown that it can bring out crowds of over 100,000 people for demonstrations, both within Iran and abroad.

For politically expedient reasons, the MEK presently assumes various titles. Some of the most commonly used ones include: The MEK, the Organization of the Peoples Mujahedin of Iran (PMOI), The NCR, Iran Relief Fund (IRF), and the Muslim Iranian Students Society (MISS). In the same vein, the MEK has also misrepresented itself as ideologically akin to the Muslim Afghan Mujahedin freedom fighters.

I. BACKGROUND AND HISTORY

A. The MEK Before the 1979 Iranian Revolution

The founders of the MEK were disaffected young members of the Liberation Movement of Iran. The Movement grew out of various intellectual groups opposed to the Shah Pahlavi during the 1950s. It advocated peaceful means to create a new regime that would combine a constitutional monarchy with West European-style socialism. The movement's leaders hoped to reconcile religious and secular opposition groups with a program based upon Shia ideals, modern Iranian cultural values, and 20th century political and economic theories. Members included both students and clerics.

The Shah's repression of opposition demonstrations in 1963 alienated the more militant younger members, many of whom were also irritated by the personal rivalries among some of the older members. Some longstanding relationships with Movement leaders persisted, however, such as those between the militants (the future MEK leaders) and the late Ayatollah Taleqani and Mehdi Bazargan. These relationships between MEK members and clerics frequently proved fatal to many clerics while Khomeini sought to consolidate power in 1979.

The original MEK leaders appear to have been profoundly influenced by the religious fanaticism of fundamentalist Iranian clerics and the anti-Shah revolutionary groups (Fedayeen -E- Khalq, Paykar, Tudeh militants) they supported. They were also impressed by the Marxist-Leninist theories and vocabulary then popularized by international revolutionary literature.

The young militants (led by nine Tehran University graduates) formed a secret discussion group that eventually became a separate organization called the Sazeman-e Mujahedin-e Khalq-e Iran (The Organization of Crusaders of the Iranian People). Its three basic tenets were:

Islam is a dynamic and revolutionary religion that can be interpreted through Marxist dialectics.

Armed struggle is the only effective tactic in the struggle against imperialism.

Other Iranian opposition movements have failed because they have lacked an effective Marxist structure.

The Mujahedin organization slowly expanded, almost entirely in urban areas—Tehran, Isfahan, Shiraz, and Tabriz, all of which were among the home towns of the group's founding members. For the first five years the group's leadership concentrated on developing their ideology and creating the groundwork for armed opposition.

In the late 1960s, the group helped to set up a public hall in Tehran to broaden the reach of their ideas. Conservative Shia clerics located in Qum were outraged at the "revisionist" form of Islam being taught at the hall, but the more moderate clerics from the Tehran Divinity School were willing to speak there.

The Shah's security service, Sazeman Amniyat Va Etela'at Keshvar (SAVAK), investigated the hall and apparently concluded that it represented a welcome irritant to the traditional clergy, not a threat to the Shah's regime. Only in 1973, after SAVAK made the connection between Mujahedin criminal activity (bombings and assassinations) and the operation of the hall, was the hall closed down.

The hall provided a forum for Dr. Ali Shariati, the young "prophet" of Iranian socialism. The group's recruitment effort was helped significantly by its association with Shariati, whose pamphlets and taped talks were enormously popular among Iranian students.

MEK concepts were similar to, but not identical with, Shariati's. While they both espoused the creation of a classless society whose duty would be to fight "world imperialism, international Zionism, colonialism, exploitation, racism, and multinational corporations," they differed over the nature of the political leader of the society. While Shariati opined that an Islamic jurist would be the proper leader, the MEK strongly believed that such a regime should be controlled by the "aware masses." As a footnote, Shariati included the Iranian clergy as an oppressor class along with landlords and capitalists, while the MEK did not.

The MEK began its violent activities within Iran in mid-1971 with efforts to disrupt the Shah's celebration of the 2500 year anniversary of the Persian monarchy. The group's plans failed miserably. Scholarly research suggests that a captured MEK member gave information under torture which led to the arrest of about seventy of his comrades. According to a former SAVAK official, a SAVAK penetration of the group about the same time led to the arrest, imprisonment, death, and execution of many other members, including all the MEK's founding members.

A brother of one of the founding members then took over the group. It was during this period that Massaud Rajavi (the current leader of the group) became influential, according to his MEK biography, although he was imprisoned by the end of 1971. When the second MEK leader was killed in 1974, the organization fell largely under the control of three young militants whose disagreements over the importance of Marxism in MEK ideology created a degree of philosophical disharmony within the organization.

The group's new leaders—most of whom were later either killed or imprisoned by Iranian security forces—began to publish an underground newspaper called Jungal (The Jungle) in the early 1970s. During this period, the MEK profited from an order issued by the Ayatollah Khomeini, then in exile in Iraq, that called on all faithful Muslims to support the group. Khomeini then began to relay money from pious Shias to the MEK. The organization also began to receive large amounts of money from wealthy merchants—some of whom were relatives of MEK members.

By late 1973, MEK leaders had developed a deeper interest in Marxist theory and were reading extensively in Asian and Latin American revolutionary writings and also early Soviet publications. In mid-1974 the group began sending agitators to Iranian shops and factories. Some of the group's leaders then began to talk openly of the necessity of incorporating Marxist theory into MEK ideology.

MEK perpetrated bombings and assassinations, after the aborted maiden effort in 1971, resumed in 1972. The organization's targets included U.S. military advisors stationed in Iran. For example, the MEK claimed responsibility for the assassination of U.S. Air Force Brigadier General Harold Price in 1972, the assassination of U.S. Air Force Lieutenant Colonel Lewis Hawkins in 1973, the assassination of U.S. Air Force Colonel Paul Schaeffer in 1975, and the assassination of U.S. Air Force Lieutenant Colonel Jack Turner, also in 1975.

The MEK also targeted U.S. civilians associated with defense projects (five killed in 1976), and numerous Iranian security officials. The group also claimed responsibility for the bombings of air and oil company offices in Iran. These attacks were well executed and were designed to attract increased attention to the anti-Shah opposition, frighten U.S. residents, and make SAVAK appear vulnerable.

In 1975, Massaud Rajavi (then imprisoned for anti-Shah activities) was accepted as the MEK's leader and chief ideologue. Under his reign, the group continued its full commitment to armed struggle. One prominent journalist who was in Iran at that time, wrote that "MEK publications have openly boasted of the assassinations of five U.S. servicemen in Iran during its campaign of destabilization [of the Shah's regime]. Rajavi is believed to have ordered those assassinations himself."

By early 1976, MEK losses in violent operations had become severe enough to compel the group to reconsider its tactics. The organization began to limit its violent activity and instead began to concentrate on recruiting new members. After some time (a few months), the MEK eventually decided to focus its recruitment efforts toward the student ranks.

By the beginning of 1978, the group had recuperated sufficiently. A young and dedicated new crop of members had been recruited, largely under the guise of "true Islam," an MEK invention which consisted of a theological model in which Marxist-Leninist concepts are superimposed on Islamic terminology. The MEK's new recruits (3,000 to 5,000 individuals at the onset of the revolution) provided the group with the necessary impetus which was instrumental during the 1979 Iranian Revolution.

In January, 1979, the MEK's leaders met in Tehran and drafted an eighteen-point resolution, entitled the Minimum Expectation Program (MEP). The organization's clandestine publication, Mojahed, as well as other newspapers, published the full text of the MEP. This document is significant for a number of reasons: first, it was written when MEK leaders believed that the group was destined for political power in Iran; second, it was adopted by a representative sampling of MEK members; and finally, it highlighted the group's political philosophy. More than any other document, the MEP is widely believed to be an honest effort by the MEK to put forward their program for reorganizing Iran's political system.

B. The MEK During the 1979 Iranian Revolution

By 1979, the MEK had found that it would be politically wise to "latch on" to the enormously popular Shia fundamentalist movement headed by Ayatollah Khomeini. As it turned out, the MEK proved to be an extremely valuable asset to Khomeini throughout the entire revolution.

Although the organization's appeal among the Iranian "masses" was minimal, the MEK became the "military" arm of the anti-Shah movement. Together with other opposition leftist groups (including the Fedayeen and Paykar), the MEK engaged in murder, arson, and acts of general sabotage which contributed to the weakening of the Iranian political system's capability to resist the opposition.

Most notable of the MEK's military operations during the revolution was the assault on the Farahabad military base outside Tehran. The assault on this base, which housed a headquarters element of the Iranian Air Force, eventually led to the neutralization of the entire Iranian military.

The MEK was also intimately involved in the takeover of the American Embassy in Tehran in 1979. Eyewitnesses and MEK documents indicate that the MEK led the assault on the Embassy and then pleaded with Khomeini not to engage in dialogue with the United States Government, nor release the American hostages seized during the action. In fact, congressional testimony indicates that Rajavi insisted to Khomeini that there was much more to gain by holding the hostages than by releasing them.

C. The MEK From 1979 to the Present

After the Iranian revolution, the MEK demanded to have a share in the new Iranian Government. However, Khomeini apparently feared the MEK's military power and grew distrustful of the organization. Influential Shia clerics under Ayatollah Beheshti's leadership were strongly opposed to any political participation by the group.

By the beginning of 1981, it became obvious to the MEK that Khomeini was excluding the group from any political power in the newly created Islamic Republic of Iran (a theocracy, a form of government despised by the MEK). That, and the tremendous turmoil within the newly created Islamic Republic (including clerical factionalism and the Iran-Iraq war) created a situation perceived to be favorable for the MEK to openly challenge the Khomeini regime.

In June, 1981, in a devastating miscalculation, Rajavi ordered his followers into open combat in the streets of Tehran. They were subsequently routed by Khomeini's forces. Shortly thereafter, Rajavi and his entourage fled Iran for Paris, France.

Between 1981 and 1984, and possibly with the help of Iraqi Government funds, Rajavi and exiled Iranian President Bani Sadr established, in Paris, the NCR. During this period, the NCR functioned primarily as a government in exile, coordinating military operations in Iran, orchestrating political and diplomatic missions, recruiting new members, and soliciting funding and weapons.

Rajavi did not believe that his presence in Paris would inhibit MEK activity within Iran. Indeed, MEK "military" actions in 1981 increased dramatically and grew more violent. For example, in August the MEK bombed the offices of the Prime Minister, killing both President Rajavi and Premier Bani Sadr. Throughout the summer and fall of 1981, Bani Sadr claimed that he had ordered the MEK to assassinate Khomeini, but that Rajavi refused because he did not want to make a martyr of him. It may be noted that while many of the Iranian political leaders who were killed by MEK operatives in 1981 traveled frequently (at least from home to their offices), Khomeini never leaves his residence.

In the spring of 1984, Rajavi and Bani Sadr became embroiled in a public dispute over whether the NCR should accept formal Iraqi Government support. In April, 1984, Bani Sadr, who was opposed to Rajavi's frequent Iraqi Government contacts, announced that he was dissolving the NCR and forming his own Iranian political opposition organization. Rajavi however, has continued to refer to the MEK as the NCR when representing the group during fund-raising and recruitment activities.

Between 1984 and 1986, the MEK expanded its recruitment and fund-raising capability. MEK cells were developed throughout Europe, the Middle East, and the United States. Referring to themselves as various Iranian opposition organizations, MEK members raised millions of dollars, recruited thousands of people (the vast majority of them being young Iranian students), began to publish a newsletter, Iran Liberation, and politically lobbied foreign governments.

The group also increased its military activities in northwest Iran, especially the region known as Kurdistan. According to international press reports, statements attributed to Iranian Government officials, and MEK literature, the military operations conducted by the MEK during this period resulted in little damage to the Iranian regime. Those operations usually originated from MEK camps on the Iraqi side of the Iran-Iraq border, and primarily consisted of "hit and run" raids on various secluded and lightly protected facilities such as frontier guard posts.

In late 1986, the French Government (under Iranian Government pressure) apparently insisted that Rajavi and his entourage leave France. At that time, the French Government was trying to improve diplomatic relations with Iran, yet Khomeini insisted that before relations could improve, France would have to extradite Rajavi to Iran. This complicated matters for the French Government because France was supporting Iraq in the Iran-Iraq war. Consequently, in lieu of extradition, the French Government made it clear to Rajavi that he was no longer welcome in France.

Whether or not Rajavi left France for that reason or because he desired to move his base of operations closer to the Iran-Iraq border (the official MEK explanation), the MEK was relocated in Iraq by the end of 1986. By 1987, MEK had established base camps on the Iran-Iraq border, conducted massive military exercises (involving up to 10,000 troops), and was conducting overnight cross border attacks on Iranian targets.

The MEK's publishing, recruitment, and fund-raising capabilities had improved dramatically by 1987. MEK support cells (representing themselves as the PMOI, Mujahedin, NCR, MISS, and IRF) had been established in virtually every nation in Western Europe, Canada, and the United States.

Primarily targeting idealistic young Iranian students, these MEK support cells had raised by 1987, millions of dollars, had successfully orchestrated major demonstrations in cities throughout the United States, Canada, Europe, and the Middle East and had obtained large amounts of weapons, ammunition, spare parts, and other military supplies from various sympathetic Governments (primarily Iraq), and had gained the support of many prominent politicians—including over 2,000 American national and local level legislators.

II. THE MEK TODAY

A. Military Operations

During 1987, MEK leaders have publicly claimed credit for many military incursions into Iran. Asserting that the organization's military force, the Iranian National Liberation Army (INLA), consists of 10,000 soldiers; group leaders have frequently published news bulletins which highlight recent clashes with Iranian troops. For example, a recent issue of Iran Liberation informs readers that the INLA has caused the death of more than 3,000 Iranian troops since January.

The INLA's current targets appear to be Iranian military convoys, communication installations, and lightly defended border communities. The tactics employed by the group predominately entail nighttime raids over the border in small units, shooting or capturing Iranian sentries, holding the targeted area until early morning, and finally blowing-up the target before returning to Iraq.

While MEK's reporting of the circumstances surrounding these raids are very likely exaggerated, there has been enough independent and reliable information which indicates that the MEK is frequently conducting military raids into Iran. Officials within the Iranian Government have also been substantiating some of those reports, however, the Iranians seem to be more concerned about the terrorist activity ("random bombings in civilian and public places") in cities throughout Iran which are attributed to the MEK.

B. Political and Diplomatic Endeavors

Outside the United States and Canada, the MEK officially represents itself as the NCR of Iran. The NCR of Iran is most frequently used by the group when its delegations visit the United Nations or take part in other international forums. For example, an NCR of Iran delegation attended the 44th Italian Socialist Party Congress in April, 1987, and another met with the leadership of the British Labor Party in the spring of 1987.

Within the United States and Canada, the MEK politically represents itself as the PMOI. The PMOI currently operates an office on Wisconsin Avenue in Washington D.C. Under the PMOI label, MEK members regularly lobby U.S. Senators and Congressman for political support. The PMOI also appears to organize anti-Khomeini demonstrations—one of which took place in Washington on June 19. This demonstration involved about 2,000 people and was well organized.

C. Funding and Recruitment

The MEK raises funds and recruits members as the IRF and the MISS. Since at least 1984, MEK members have been going door to door soliciting "charitable" contributions on behalf of the IRF in the Washington D.C. area and in twelve states elsewhere around the country. The U.S. Department of State (USDS) in a 1987 public source report cited that the IRF, which is based on K Street, Northwest in Washington, is not only affiliated with the MEK, but is in fact a front name for the group.

The IRF has been successful in its fund raising efforts. Washington Post staff writer, Molly Sinclair, wrote in 1985 that registration papers filed by the IRF in Maryland and in Virginia disclosed that the organization collected $97,230 from American contributors during the year that ended in September, 1984.

MEK members representing themselves as the MISS are also involved in fund raising activities, however, these efforts appear to be limited to college and university students around the world. The group solicits donations from sympathetic students—Iranian and others. The MISS may also be involved in recruiting activities for the MEK. While the USDA publicly regard the MISS as a front name for the MEK, it appears that the MISS may provide a communication link between MEK headquarters in Baghdad and Iranian students who are scattered throughout the world. MISS chapters located in colleges and universities throughout the United States, appear to be primarily involved in distributing MEK literature and conducting seminars.

D. Propaganda

The MEK's main propaganda organ in the United States is Iran Liberation. Billed as the "news bulletin of the Peoples Mujahedin of Iran," the six-page newsletter informs readers of MEK-related political dynamics, military operations, and various atrocities committed by the Khomeini regime. The newsletter, which cites a Wisconsin Avenue, Washington, D.C. address, is handed out at PMOI, IRF, and MISS activities within the United States. With a nominal donation (unspecified amount) forwarded to the listed address, a subscriber is somewhat regularly apprised of news that the MEK deems important.

All propaganda published and distributed by the various MEK groups (PMOI, IRF, MISS) contain terminology, photographs, and names which easily link them to each other and to the MEK. For example, most issues of the PMOI's Iran Liberation contain numerous reference to MEK leader Massaud Rajavi and his wife, as well as describe MEK military activity. The same is true for IRF and MISS literature. Both groups distribute Iran Liberation, hand out pamphlets which depict Rajavi, and espouse traditional MEK political philosophy.

The PMOI and the IRF routinely distribute pamphlets which describe many unsubstantiated human rights violations committed by the Khomeini regime. Photographs of tortured and executed Iranians, articles regarding the murder of Iranian women and children, and stories about the Khomeini regime's support of international terrorism are some of the most common topics.

III. INTERNATIONAL STRUCTURE

A. Biographies of Prominent Members

Massaud Rajavi

The forty-year-old Rajavi has been the leader of the MEK since 1975. According to his official MEK biography, he joined the group in 1966 and was responsible for organizing its ideological instruction program. Born in either Mashhad or Tabas, Iran, Rajavi graduated from Tehran University with a degree in political science (he joined the MEK while he attended the university). In 1970 he went to Lebanon and Jordan for training by the Palestine Liberation Organization.

Rajavi was arrested by SAVAK in 1971 (for anti-government activities) and was sentenced to life imprisonment. From 1975, he remained the only surviving high-level MEK official, and until 1978, he led the group from prison. Released in 1978 under one of the Shah's amnesties, Rajavi subsequently took full control of the organization. Possibly residing in Gavanah, Iraq (on the Iran-Iraq border), Rajavi appears to control the MEK's military, political, funding, and recruitment activities.

Rajavi is currently married to his third wife. Official MEK biographies state that his first wife, Ashraf, was killed by Khomeini military forces during a raid on the Rajavi residence in February 1982. Rajavi then married Firouzeh, the daughter of Bani Sadr. That marriage failed when Firouzeh filed for divorce after Bani Sadr disassociated himself from the NCR. In 1985, Rajavi married Maryam (then a co-leader of the MEK).

Ali Safavi

Safavi is the MEK's official representative to the United States. Thirty-four years old, Safavi appears to be the person charged with the responsibility of convincing the American public and politicians that the Khomeini regime is in political, military, and economic difficulty, and that Massaud Rajavi is the only alternative. An Iranian exile, Safavi is a sociologist who studied for his doctorate at the University of Michigan.

Shahin Gobadi

Gobadi was the MEK's spokesman during the anti-Khomeini demonstration which the group held on June 19, 1987, in Washington, D.C.

Hamid Boka'i

Boka'i is predominately pictured and described in MEK literature as a "Mojahedin representative for International relations."

Ahmad Foroughi

Foroughi has frequently been pictured and described in MEK newsletters as a member of the NCR of Iran international delegation.

Mohammad-Hossein Naghdi

Naghdi has also frequently been pictured and described in MEK literature as a Member of the NCR of Iran international delegation.

B. Organizational Structure

There is not a large amount of available data regarding the organizational structure of the MEK. However, a review of MEK literature, as well as the small number of independent books and articles which have been published on the group, indicates that some linkages can be made. There appears to be little doubt that MEK headquarters is located within Iraq, in either Baghdad or Gavanah. The MEK's National Resistance Council appears to function as the parliament of the organization.

MEK presence in European and North American nations is usually in the form of the PMOI, IRF, and MISS. The PMOI offices appear to serve as the official linkage between MEK headquarters and the host country (similar to an ambassadorial relationship). The PMOI officer usually represents the organization to the press, to legislators, and to heads of state. PMOI offices are located in cities of countries which contain the seat of government.

MISS chapters, which are located on college campuses throughout Europe and North America, probably function as the linkage between MEK headquarters and Iranian students. Because the MEK relies heavily on student support (both financial and militarily) the MISS may have direct political access to MEK national headquarters. MISS chapters may also perform intelligence functions for MEK headquarters, monitoring both pro-Khomeini and pro-monarchist supporters—as well as identifying potential recruits.

The IRF seems to serve as the MEK's "grass roots" level fund-raising operation. Based in small offices, IRF members operate door-to-door in neighborhood communities soliciting donations. Even though the IRF may be a valuable source of revenue for the group, there is no indication that the IRF is directly connected to MEK headquarters. It is plausible to assume that the IRF operates under the direction of the PMOI.

The following graphic may portray the bureaucratic structure of the MEK.

[Graph not reproducible in the Record.]

While the above reflects a cursory command and control structure, it should be noted that a great deal of flexibility may exist. For example, the INLA may be partly controlled by the National Resistance Council. Also, the PMOI and the MISS may not be linked. The possibility that the IRF and the MISS are linked cannot be ruled out. Because these groups are basically one organization, members may interchange roles.

IV. IDEOLOGY

A. Influence of Marxism and Shia Islam

Marxism and Shia Islam have had a profound effect on the development of MEK ideology from the group's inception in the mid-1960s. The founding members of the group believed that Shi'ism provided the revolutionary theistic basis which would attract idealistic, yet religious Iranians. Marxism was seen as the political framework in which the MEK could achieve its goals.

For two years the original members of the MEK researched various Marxist and Shia writings and eventually produced a booklet entitled The Profile of a Muslim. The booklet, written by Ahmad Rezaei, contained many classic Shia statements attributed to Imam Ali (the first Shia Imam) and tracts from the Koran. These writings were incorporated by the group in order to show that the original Islamic society had been a homogeneous community which, due to the establishment of private property and other Western institutions, had subsequently deteriorated into antagonistic classes and nations.

MEK members argued that the Koran looked to the establishment of a classless society and called on the oppressed Muslims to struggle to achieve it. In this struggle, Hussein, the martyred third Shia Imam, was to be taken as the model. The MEK argued that classless society was to be the same as the promised society of the Mahdi (the Shia Twelfth Imam) wherein principles of divine justice would prevail.

This society, referred to by the MEK as "Towhid," will be a society of unity and plenty where "each contributes according to his ability and each receives according to his need." MEK leaders believe that there would be no exploitation of man by man in this society as well as no "social, ethnic, and economic contradictions, and no human conflict." To achieve this society, the MEK believes an "all out war" must be waged on all exploiters and oppressors who are being led by "the American imperialists."

This blend of revolutionary Islam and Marxism has helped attract many idealistic, young, politically frustrated Iranians to the MEK. The organization has crafted its philosophy and applied it consistently to Iranian domestic and foreign affairs. It reinterprets the Koran and several influential Shia texts using concepts from a wide range of international revolutionary literature. The MEK present their program and the theories behind it as a dynamic response to the problems of modern Iran and as a model for other revolutionary groups.

B. Central Ideological Principles

The MEK's central principles are twofold. The first entails the total opposition to "U.S. imperialism," which is the principal enemy of revolutionaries. To the group, all the events which occur within Iran involve this confrontation. The second is that political, social, and economic power must be used in the service of ideology. To the group, if "practical considerations" take precedence over ideology, progress cannot be made toward the ideal Islamic society.

Other recurring themes are the superiority of collective interests over those of individuals, the primacy of Iranian political and social models over those originating abroad, and the necessity of remolding the attitudes and behavior of the people to remove the effects of corrupting influences.

In their analysis of 20th century Iran, MEK theorists argue that the 1905 revolution transformed Iran from a feudal society into a bourgeois system heavily dependent upon Western capitalism and under the domination of imperialism—especially U.S. imperialism. They believe that by the late 1960s, cultural, economic, political, and military imperialism threatened the very existence of Iran. The MEK says that the Pahlavi reign had little support outside the Westernized middle and upper class and it ruled by terror and propaganda. MEK texts call for "heroic acts of violence" to awaken the people and begin the breakup of oppressive societies.

In the current situation, the Shia fundamentalists are guilty of "pragmatism" believing that their end (the Islamic Republic) justifies the temporary use of unacceptable methods. To the MEK, the fundamentalists have corrupted their ideological principles. The MEK's leftist rivals (Fedayeen -E- Khalq and Paykar) are said to be "opportunists" who openly disregard principles in guiding their activities.

While the MEK strongly endorsed the leadership of Khomeini over the "unified masses" that toppled the Shah, they argued that he has not provided the necessary force to prevent the fundamentalists' corruption of the principles of the 1978 revolution. Consequently, the MEK believes that imperialism may reassert itself within Iran.

In the MEK's view, the Shia fundamentalists turned away from Khomeini's emphasis on the will of the people at the beginning of the new regime. Khomeini and his supporters have, according to the MEK, allowed their "pragmatic" fear of the return of imperialist influence and their "opportunistic" fear of losing control of the revolution to restrict the choices and information open to the people, and have consequently oppressed them.

C. Specific Excerpts of MEK Texts

Early MEK writings (1966-1971), such as passages in Mujahid, primarily address issues regarding Shiism and its role within the organization's revolutionary program. Some examples of MEK writings on these topics include:

"After years of extensive study of Islamic history and Shia ideology, our organization has reached the firm conclusion that Islam, especially Shiism, will play a major role in inspiring the masses to join the revolution. Shiism has both a revolutionary message and a special place in our hearts," and

"A man is a true Muslim only if he is a revolutionary. A Muslim is either a revolutionary or not a true Muslim. In the whole of the Koran, there is not a single Muslim who was not a revolutionary."

An enlightening essay published by the MEK regarding Islam, and Islam's role within the group's ideological framework, is found in a statement publicly issued by the group in 1977. This statement was issued in response to the Iranian Government's public assertions that the MEK was an un-Islamic terrorist organization. The statement, in part, reads:

"Which Islam is it that the Shah refers to? Is it not the Islam of Imperialism? The counterfeit 'Islam' of imperialism is carefully spoon-fed to Muslim countries, and results in their colonization, with the imperialists ultimately in control of the economics, education, and culture of the Muslim countries. According to this 'Islam of Imperialism', Islam is made for the next world only and has nothing to do with the life of this world. . . .

"The Imperialist's brand of Islam dictates that Islamic nations be their colonies and allows them to loot all the wealth, resources, and productivity of Muslim nations. But the Islam of the Prophet Mohammad (on whom be peace) is the only true Islam. Its revolutionary spirit is not compatible with, or comparable to, the (present) weakness and spinelessness of the Muslims. The Islam which Prophet Mohammad brought would never provide land to Zionists for them to cultivate and produce food for their armies aiding them to kill the oppressed and impoverished Palestinian masses.

"Under the Islam taught by Prophet Mohammad, the treacherous Shah and his exploitive guests would not serve themselves 50-year old French champagne. The Islam which the Prophet Mohammad brought is revolutionary and it is for precisely this reason that the Iranian Muslims are joining the revolution. The Shah is afraid of the new wave of Islamic cultural revolution, a wave that is adhered to and propagated by none other than the Mujahideen-e-Khalq. We have not brought with us a new religion. Islam, from its beginning, has been progressive and revolutionary, and has fought against oppression. We are revolting today, as Islam has always done, to break down the obstacles that are blocking the path of man and society towards perfection.

"The Shah is frightened from this wave of Muslim awakening. He is frightened of a revolutionary Islam. He attempts to discredit such a movement and cries out: 'A revolutionary cannot be a Muslim. One must be either a Muslim or a revolutionary!' (According to the Shah's logic) a person who participates in any guerrilla activity must, therefore, be a non-believer; one who is both a revolutionary and a Muslim must be a liar and an apostate by the regime's standards.

"The truth is that a Muslim can be nothing but a revolutionary. If the battle against oppression and immorality is Un-Islamic, if the battle against the supporters and servants of imperialists is Un-Islamic, if the battle against corruption is Un-Islamic, if a desire for freedom is Un-Islamic, if the battle against the exploitation of the people is Un-Islamic, then we and the rest of the Iranian people confess to being Un-Islamic.

"Furthermore, if sucking the blood of hardworking people and plundering the production of farmers and labourers and profiteering from the people's essential needs is Islamic, if placing the country's fate and its people in the hands of American and Zionist spies and military advisers is Islamic, if possession of castles and luxurious mansions, and private airplanes, while the people are starving to death in masses, is Islamic, if making farmers homeless, and gunning down students and labourers is Islamic, if torturing the mothers, fathers, wives, children, sisters and brothers of fugitive revolutionaries is Islamic, if plundering the vast resources of oil, arranging the most wasteful celebrations in history (the Shah's self-coronation and celebrations marking 2500 years of monarchy in Iran that is estimated to have cost the State treasury a hundred million dollars) spending millions of dollars from the treasury of our destitute people for the pleasure of a bunch of treacherous international criminals is Islamic, then we, alongside all the Iranian people confess to being non-Muslims, and we wish to clearly state that only the Shah and his servants and supporters in his Pharoanic rule can be Muslims.

"It is a great honour for us to be recognized by the treacherous regime of the Shah as his enemy. This indicates that our essence is contradictory to the nature of his bloodshedding regime. (Ours) is a sacred war and an answer to God's Commandment: 'Why should you not fight in the cause of God and in the cause of those who being weak are ill-treated and oppressed? Men, women and children who cry, will our Lord rescue us from this town, whose people are oppressors, and raise up for us, one who will help?' (the Quran, 4:75)."

MEK literature also contains examples of the organization's reliance on Marxist ideology and terminology. An essay within Mojahed, an early MEK publication, was written in 1975 to "clarify" its involvement with Marxists. The statement reads as follows:

"The Shah is terrified of revolutionary Islam. The regime is trying to place a wedge between Muslims and Marxists. In our view there is only one major enemy—imperialism and its local collaborators. When SAVAK shoots, it kills both Muslims and Marxists. Consequently, in the present situation there is organic unity between Muslim revolutionaries and Marxist revolutionaries. In truth, why do we respect Marxism? Of course, Marxism and Islam are not identical. Nevertheless, Islam is definitely closer to Marxism than to Pahlavism. Islam and Marxism teach the same lessons for they fight against injustice. Islam and Marxism contain the same message, for they inspire martyrdom, struggle, and self-sacrifice. Who is closer to Islam—the Vietnamese who fight against American Imperialism or the Shah who helps Zionism? Since Islam fights oppression, it will work with Marxism, which also fights oppression. They have a common enemy, i.e., the reactionary imperialist."

The MEK's two major strategy programs are the Nine Point Policy (published in 1969) and the Minimum Expectation Program (published in 1980). The Nine Point Policy was the product of an assignment given to a sixteen-member committee which was charged with formulating MEK policy and strategy. After eight months of study, the policy was published:

1. Iran was dominated by world imperialism, especially U.S. imperialism. Its economy was mainly under the control of comprador bourgeoisie, meaning that land reform had transformed the country from a 'Bourgeois-feudal' to a 'Bourgeois-comprador' system.

2. Land reform essentially caused revolutionary potential in the countryside to subside. Because real land reform had not been implemented and oppressive relations in the countryside still existed, initiating a Chinese-style struggle in the countryside was impossible, although the potential for revolutionary activity remains.

3. Iran was essentially a police state where the armed forces constituted the ultimate power base. The strength and political stability of the regime was based on the effective functioning of its security forces, which were directed by the American Central Intelligence Agency.

4. Because antagonistic class pressures and political awareness of the Iranian masses has reached a high point, the vanguard groups did not need to expose the true face of the regime to the people. But through appropriate political activities, mass alienation had to be intensified.

5. By extending the struggle to the masses of people and allaying hopelessness and fear, the regime must be destabilized via the disruption of the police network—the main force causing disunity in the anti-government struggle. This can only take place by armed struggle.

6. The organization, whether on the basis of monotheistic ideology or on its understanding of historical experiences, concluded that the religion of Islam in general, and the Shia school of thought in the revolutionary and combative traditions of Shia, such as the uprising of Imam Hussein, could be useful in the mobilization of the masses.

7. Because of the awareness of the anti-government forces in the cities (since the Constitutional Revolution, almost all struggles have taken place in the cities) and because the regime, under the guise of land reform, was able to cover up its weaknesses in the rural areas, guerrilla warfare should be initiated in the cities where actions for destabilizing the government and its police network were possible. The struggle in the cities must follow these guidelines:

- a. Striking blows to the police network because it was the main pillar of the dictatorial, imperialist regime.

- b. Safeguarding the organization against destruction by a major police crackdown. This was to be accomplished by building a strong social base in Iranian society and preparing substitute units to fill in when required.

- c. Infiltrating the police network so that their operations were known by the organization prior to initiation.

8. The expansion of guerrilla warfare to the countryside. The organization believed that the major forces of revolution consisted of the workers and the peasants. Of course, this did not imply that the struggle had its ends in the cities; rather, the organization believed the ultimate collapse of the regime would be achieved through guerrilla warfare in the cities while the overall collapse would be accomplished by surrounding the cities from rural military bases.

9. Victory would be achieved through the combined use of a liberation army and rural guerrilla warfare. Therefore, after the struggle in the countryside, the task of creating a 'Peoples Army' must be undertaken to confront the regime's forces.

The Minimum Expectation Program remains the most complete official statement written by the MEK leadership. The Minimum Expectation Program is an all-inclusive statement about economic, social, and political issues. While the Minimum Expectation Program reveals much about the MEK's ideological orientation, the statement is more revealing in respect to the group's positions regarding economic policies, military issues, rights of women and minorities, rights of peasants, and finally foreign affairs. It may be noted that since 1980 some slight modifications have been made to the Minimum Expectation Program, however, those changes have consisted only of softening certain ideological issues rather than altering any of the document's main points. The Minimum Expectation Program reads:

1. All comprador investments must be appropriated. This capital has been the cause of the greatest misery and oppression for our workers, not to speak of the untold strife it has created for our national enterprise.

- a. Foreign-owned, colonialist banks which have plundered this nation must be closed down.

- b. Foreign-owned, and comprador businesses, plants, and affiliated agricultural enterprises must be expropriated and handed over to the people, and the management of these operations handled by a staff council (comprising workers, clerical personnel, and a representative of the government). The aim is to build anew on the shards of colonialist enterprise an equitable system based on Islam and moving towards Towhid [Divine Integration].

2. National control must be established over all of the nation's natural resources, not the least of which is petroleum. All shameful colonialist agreements in this field must be irrevocably terminated.

As the Quran expressed it: natural resources and public wealth are included in the concept of anfaal (the spoils of war) or, by extension, the commonwealth. The utilization of resources in the way of God and His Prophet means employing these benefits for the commonwealth, whereby no single individual has an interest and all are freed from the bonds that inhibit virtue.

3. Massive, large-scale investment enterprises must be avoided whereby costly luxury industrial conglomerates are allowed to expand at the expense of moderately-scaled and small industries. Preference should naturally be given to agriculture over industry or a healthy economic development and the ideological channeling of the technocrats and bureaucrats will be impossible.

4. A popular army must be established. Adjust and popular economic development where the welfare of the down-trodden is given priority has no place for the fostering of a paper-tiger army, top-heavy with the latest in fancy and costly weaponry. The devotion of resources to the building up of an unwieldy facade of any army shares the same unbalanced character as the haphazard growth situation in other economic and social areas.

A political system which lacks popular support by its very nature is forced to develop and maintain an army which must be equipped with complex weapons and cultivates a phony "professionalism" which divorces it from the masses in its preoccupation with standing up to foreign threats and putting down domestic 'insurrection.'

Such an army has no alternative but to build up the external apertenance of its weaponry and to play down the human factor of its personnel. Its destiny leads it into becoming absorbed into the imperialist military complex whereby it is made dependent on imperialist logistics (for the supply of complex weaponry) an imperialist advisory personnel.

Such an army is in direct contact only with the ruling bureaucracy and is dependent on a base which is beyond the frontiers of the land which it purportedly serves. To expect popular reactions and a popular performance from such an army would be the height of absurdity.

Our bitter experience with the Imperial Army over the last fifty years is a clear indication of the truth of this assertion. It is for this reason that we call for the establishment of an army of the people, an army which fights for the things in which the people believe and for the interests of the people as a whole. It is not a hiring army of mercenaries fighting only for money, whose sole motive is receiving their wages.

At this point it should be made clear that the establishment of a popular army in no way implies the deprivation of individual rights or the application of pressure, material or moral, on our brave brothers who make up the Iranian armed forces at the moment. What we are calling for is a foundational transformation of the structure and content of relations in the army in such a manner that our army brothers may never again be forced into a system which shunts and restricts the expression of their will to participate and develop their talents in the popular way. This is the place, then, to review the characteristics of what constitutes a popular army:

- a. In the popular army there is no blind obedience. Ideology and a correct line of policy, blended with political awareness, provide the guiding force for such an army.

- b. The popular army is a national army in the service of the defence of the country and the defender of the interests of the people against foreign aggression.

- c. The popular army is completely integrated into society and completely harmonious, particularly with the strata of the most oppressed among the people.

- d. The popular army is an integrated unity in its own right when it possesses the foregoing characteristics. It permits no under distinctions of privilege within its ranks, between enlisted man, NCO or officer. All eat the same food and no remarkable differences exist in pay and facilities. Promotions are made through consultations with personnel, and unity is maintained throughout by a common appeal to iron discipline, understood by all.

An army which develops a standard of structural relationships like this will have the closest popular relationship with the masses. Actually the prototype for this kind of army is the model army of the early days of Islam, which was composed of soldiers and officers whose sole motivation was service to God and the people. The internal and external relations of armies under the command of the Prophet and of Iman Ali, among the personnel and with the civilians, can provide an instructive case for those who seek to form an army designed to carry out its functions in the name of Islam. In the words of Ali to Malek Ashtar, "Be kind to your subordinates and hard on arrogant oppressors."

e. Service in the popular army is never compulsory.

f. The popular army can never be dominated by foreign advisors.

g. The popular army not only does not participate in unjust imperialist wars or in counter-revolutionary conflicts such as the crushing of the freedom-fighters of Dhofar in Oman, but is at the disposal of all revolutionary movements such as the Palestinian sincerity in seeking justice and equity, they have no fear of their ideologies being the object of debate.

5. Of course, it should be made crystal clear that there are distinct demarcations between revolutionary freedom and democracy and the approach of liberalism and irresponsible capitalism, distinctions which cannot be ignored in any revolutionary system. As the Quran expresses it, "Do not follow that of which you have no knowledge nor penetrating understanding" (Asraa', 36). Imam Ali always stressed that he would never be the first to draw his sword or launch a conflict to counter the views of someone else no matter how hostilely his opponents might present their views. Imam Jaafar Sadeq, the Sixth Imam of the Shiite sect, sat for hours while his ideological and philosophical opponents ranted and harangued him, never losing his patience or dignity, or behaving in any way disrespectfully towards them. And, indeed, if we believe that Islam is the highest path, why should we feel threatened by other ideas and opinions?

Peoples of different regions must be provided with full political rights to enjoy their own cultural expressions, all within the framework of the overall unity, solidarity, and sovereignty of the country. We believe fundamentally that the way the 'nationalities' question is confronted determines the manner in which we evaluate the extent of genuineness and revolutionary legitimacy of a truly popular Towhidi government system.

(The Minimum Expectation Program then outlines policies in respect to workers and peasants).

All anti-labor regulations and legislation must be abolished, and new labor laws must be enacted based on the views of the workers.

Housing must be provided for all workers.

The management of the Workers Welfare Bank and other labor banks and funds must be turned over to the workers themselves.

All governmental wage deductions must be eliminated from worker's salaries. Workers' benefits (health, retirement, casualty, etc.) must be provided from petroleum revenues.

The administration of factories should be carried out by a council composed of representatives of the councils of the workers and of the clerical personnel and representatives of the employer.

Contractual labor must be changed to formal employment (with all its attendant wage guarantees and benefit provisions).

The worker must have a share in the factory profits.

Like the workers, the oppressed peasants of this land must not be forced to bear the debts incurred with government agencies of the previous regime.

The very lands which were usurped from the peasants by the institutions of the previous regime should be returned to the peasant owners.

Basic technology and interest-free agricultural loans must be provided.

The working and productive farmer should not be subjected to land or produce tax.

A concerted effort must be made to encourage and provide the necessary conditions for the establishment of peoples' co-operatives.

All foreign interference of any kind, as well as the importation of foreign agricultural products, must be resisted.

Housing must be provided for farmers through the construction of suitable complexes as a deterrent to the farmers to migrate to the cities.

(Finally, the Minimum Expectation Program addresses the following goals and objectives in respect to foreign policy):

1. A complete political and economic boycott of the racist governments of Israel, Zimbabwe (formerly Rhodesia), and the Union of South Africa should be instituted. By the same token assistance should be provided to liberation movements around the world with the adoption of resolute, decisive political positions in support of all freedom causes.

2. Iran should withdraw from all humiliating imperialist agreements, open or secret, political or military, and join the United Nations bloc of non-aligned nations.

The following text is taken from a speech given by MEK leader Massaud Rajavi in 1972 during his trial proceedings. According to Suroosh Irfani (see preface), the text of this speech was widely circulated among MEK members and sympathizers during the period before the 1979 revolution. The statement reads:

"This trial will end tonight or tomorrow night. So perhaps these are the last nights of our lives. If we are not executed, we will be sentenced to life imprisonment. The regime is holding this trial because the people's movement has intensified and international concern for the state of political prisoners in Iran has increased. For example, Jean Paul Sartre has requested for permission to attend this trial. Al-Fateh issued a special bulletin in our support, and radio Iraq has read out the names of a number of the Shah's political prisoners threatened with execution. The Pahlavi regime, therefore, decided it was in its own interest to hold this trial.

"Each of us has been allocated only half an hour for his defense. Since this does not give us sufficient time to present our case in our ideological context, my comrades will continue the text of this defense in the context of political and economic realities and the rationale and history of our organization and revolutionary struggle.

"The cause for our misfortune and the suffering of all the people at this stage in history is international imperialism. Puppet regimes have been installed here and there by imperialism. Were these regimes to rely on themselves and their people, they would not last even for a day. There are two fronts in the world today. On the one side are the impoverished, the deprived and exploited masses, the homeless and the hungry, the struggling Palestinians and revolutionaries. On the other side are the affluent, the greedy owners of oil wells, big industries and war machines. There is no question of a compromise or a human relationship between those two fronts. We are proud of what you call are our crimes. We feel honored that we are fighting, hand in hand with other revolutionaries, for destroying imperialism and Zionism. Only two options face us today. Either struggle or surrender. Either we must fight like the Vietnamese, Chinese, and Palestinians, or we must submit ourselves to bondage, like the (Shah's) Iran. The odds we are facing in our struggle are heavy. But a human being cannot be cleansed without suffering and trial. When I speak these words, I have in mind the mothers and fathers whose children are in prison. But such is the philosophy of life. Their children will be destroyed physically, but dawn is near. We must endure.

"I and my friends are children of Dr. Mossadeq and followers of his path for national independence and freedom. We have turned our backs on money and position. It was the people who brought Dr. Mossadeq to power to work for nationalization of oil. His was the only legal government our country has had. But Mossadeq was overthrown and the political opponents of the (Shah's) regime were massacred. Following this, the regime flung open the doors for the unrestrained plunder of Iran's wealth. Oil revenues began to be mainly used for purchasing arms and paying the salaries of American advisers.

"Today, the regime has found itself compelled to don a new dress in order to prolong its survival. It is carrying out land reforms and sharing profits with factory workers. But it is playing imperialism's game. Since the coup, (against Mossadeq in 1953) corruption in government administration and bribery are on the increase as are the misfortunes and deprivations imposed on the people by the ruling classes. Take a look at the shanty towns around Tehran. If the poor fall sick, they are condemned to die while waiting unattended outside the hospitals. The shanty town dwellers have nothing to lose except their debts. In rural areas, exploitation by landlords has been replaced by exploitation by the government. These are some of the things creating readiness for revolution. Under conditions when all voices of protest are being muffled and people are suppressed, the only way for struggle is armed resistance by the people.

"To serve government propaganda, the regime's Prosecutor is accusing us of wasting the country's foreign exchange in purchasing arms. I wish to ask: are we the ones who have transferred huge amounts of foreign exchange from this country and sold the nation, or you? Who is hoarding foreign exchange in Swiss accounts? Who owns the hotels, night clubs, and casinos? If he (the Shah) has not acquired all these by robbing the nation of its wealth, then we must assume that his father was a thief. Are we the ones who are wasting the country's foreign exchange or those who import luxury goods and cosmetics, dresses from Dior and flowers from the Hague, whose expenditure for a night of revelry is astronomical.

"Our oil resources are being heartlessly plundered. If the present trend is to continue, Iran's oil reserves would be depleted by 1987. The present oil production stands at 227 million tons a year. Iran is receiving only $1.3 for every $10 of oil that is taken away and sold at high prices in European markets. We are losing at least two billion dollars in this unequal transaction. Mr. Prosecutor, take a look at this amount, and not at the foreign exchange we have used for purchasing a few machine guns. Hundreds of millions of dollars are ending up in the pockets of foreign companies. In a Press statement, the chairman of the planning commission has confessed that an amount running into hundreds of millions had been embezzled under various pretexts. We were promised that with the oil income, Iran would become a welfare state. But the masses have become more impoverished. People are denied their legal rights. When the workers of brick and smelting factories went on strike, soldiers opened fire on them. 200 workers were killed. Troops killed Dr. Khan Ali during the teachers' strike, and wounded so many others. The teachers and the factory workers had merely asked for a salary increase. Yet they were fired at, and their killers got promotions. When the regime reacts to the legitimate demands of the people in this manner, is it possible to remain silent and not pick up a gun?

"Our country is suppressed under the tips of bayonets. To resist this general suppression, even the clergy, which had withdrawn for the past 50 years, is entering the scene of struggle against the Pahlavi regime. There was an uprising in Qom. Students of religious schools attacked soldiers and soldiers killed two persons.

"This led to an uprising by the clergy, the bazaar merchants, and students. The result was the massacre in June 1963. It was after this massacre that Hanifnejad and Badizadegan came to the conclusion that it was not possible to secure one's rights through discussion and logical arguments. They referred to the Quran and the Nahjul Balagha to begin a new revolutionary movement. Besides the Mujahideen -E- Khalq, other revolutionary groups have emerged and continue to emerge to fight for the defense of human dignity.

"That so many revolutionaries are joining the underground resistance shows that the existing conditions are such that hundreds of our best youth have stepped on the path of armed struggle. This proves that our struggle is not waged for any personal motive or objective. Hundreds of highly qualified doctors and engineers are on this path. Ten years ago, the activity of opposition groups was limited to the clandestine distribution of newsletters and bulletins. But now we are picking up arms. This is only the beginning of our struggle. We are aware that victory cannot be achieved quickly and easily. Hazrat Ali has said: 'God does not destroy the exploiters and oppressors of the times Himself. He gives them the opportunity to return to the straight path. When they do not do so, they sink deeper into the swamps of exploitation and decadence. Then He delegates to the people the responsibility to carry out Divine Justice. God does not heal the fractured bones of any nation without suffering and trial.'

"The (Pahlavi) regime is endeavoring to lead our youth astray by propagating the moral decadence of Western capitalism. Instead of creating conditions for heightening the social and political consciousness of the young, the regime is encouraging corruption and immorality by setting up 'Youth Palaces' (and such filthy publications as Zan-e-Rooz (Woman Today)). The regime's objective is to prevent the young from getting involved with the real problems concerning them and their society.

"Ruthless suppression is being openly practiced in order to crush the spirit of resistance and instill an attitude of despair and powerlessness among people. Armed guards are being installed in universities. SAVAK's budget is running into hundreds of millions. No one can be taken into employment without first undergoing a screening by SAVAK. The Police and SAVAK have been given unlimited authority for dealing with political dissidents. The director of Qazal Qile prison has instructed his personnel to deal with political dissidents as a butcher deals with the lamb. The regime is not prepared to tolerate opposition or criticism in any form. The workers of Jahan textile industry who were demanding a pay raise were attacked by soldiers. Twelve of the factory workers were killed. A few months ago, soldiers attacked Tehran University and Arya Mehr University. Even the professors were mistreated and assaulted.

"There is nothing the regime can do but intensify its oppression. This is a clear indication of its weakness and is a sign of its impending doom. Political prisoners are being subjected to savage torture.

"Many of them have died under torture. According to article 131 of the Constitution, if an official causes the death of a political prisoner (under interrogation and torture) he is to be dealt with as a murderer. Yet the killers of political prisoners are going about freely and getting promotions. Burning the body of the prisoners with a stove, pulling out the fingernails, whipping and blows to the genitals are the methods most often used. Mohammad Hanif-negad was beaten so heavily that the bones of his hands, feet, nose, and ears were crushed. Behrooz Dehqani was killed under torture. A baton smeared with acid was thrust into the rectum of Masood Ahmadzadeh. Before he died, Ahmadzadeh had to spend two months of gruelling agony in hospital. You cannot endure listening to our words. We do not expect this inhuman regime to treat us differently. That is why we are fighting to overthrow it. We are looking forward to that day when our people will drag the traitors to the people's court. Down with American imperialism. Hail to those who endure agonies and suffering for the sakes of revolution and freedom."

THE PEOPLE'S MOJAHEDIN ORGANIZATION OF IRAN

(By Kenneth Katzman, Analyst in Middle Eastern Affairs, Foreign Affairs and National Defense Division)

SUMMARY

Once a partner in the coalition that overthrew the Shah of Iran, the People's Mojahedin Organization of Iran (PMOI) is now a major opponent of the regime in Tehran. It advocates democracy, human rights protection, and free market economics for Iran, but its past commitment to left-wing positions has led many observers to question its true intentions. While noting that the PMOI is the most active and effective Iranian opposition group, most observers doubt it currently has sufficient strength to threaten the regime's grip on power. Because of the Mojahedin's alleged use of terrorism during its fight against the former Shah, its early association with the Khomeini regime, and ties with Iraq, the State Department refuses to meet with its representatives. Many in Congress, however, have publicly supported the group or its goals.

INTRODUCTION

Iran's major opposition group, the People's Mojahedin Organization of Iran (PMOI) was formed in 1963. It has clear control over the twenty-two member umbrella group called the National Council of Resistance of Iran (NCR), which was established in 1981 to give the appearance of a broad-based opposition coalition. The military arm of the PMOI/NCR, the Iraq-based National Liberation Army (NLA), was formally established in 1987. All three organizations are led by Masud Rajavi and his wife, Maryam, who serves as Secretary General of the PMOI and deputy commander of the NLA.

Organizational History: The PMOI was founded in 1963 (the year Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini began his revolutionary struggle against the Shah) as a militant, revolutionary, anti-Shah organization.¹ Ideologically, it attempted to blend Islamic fundamentalism and Marxism, but its increasing emphasis on Marxism, in the mid-1970s, caused many of the Islamic elements in the organization to split off and work more closely with the clerics close to Ayatollah Khomeini.² These ideological differences did not prevent the PMOI from cooperating with the clerical forces in toppling the Shah, but tensions between the Mojahedin and Khomeini increased significantly after the triumph of the revolution in February 1979. The clerics began to consolidate their control over the government and exclude the non-clerical groups from power. The PMOI also diverged from other leftist groups such as the pro-Moscow Tudeh Party, which continued to back the clerics.

Mojahedin relations with the clerics worsened throughout 1980 and 1981.³ Ayatollah Khomeini refused to allow the PMOI's leader, Masud Rajavi, to run in the January 1980 presidential elections because the group had boycotted a referendum on the new Islamic republican constitution.⁴ The PMOI held a major demonstration on June 20, 1981, which turned into an armed confrontation with the regime. Former President Abol Hassan Bani-Sadr was perceived as encouraging the PMOI demonstrations and cultivating the PMOI as a base of support; he was removed as President the next day. On July 29, 1981, PMOI leader Masud Rajavi and the ousted Bani-Sadr secretly escaped to Paris and announced the formation of the National Council of Resistance (NCR). Blocked from power through legal means, the Mojahedin launched a major armed revolt in September 1981, which was crushed by the regime's Revolutionary Guard and set off the regime's campaign to wipe out the PMOI within Iran. The regime also charged the group with responsibility for bombings at the headquarters of the Islamic Republican Party (IRP), the cleric's party organization) and the Prime Minister's office in the summer of 1981, which killed many major regime leaders.⁵

Despite their difference, the PMOI and the clerics shared an uncompromising anti-American and anti-Western orientation. The PMOI is charged with killing several Americans in Iran as part of its underground struggle against the Shah. According to the State Department, these included U.S. military adviser Lt. Col. Lewis Hawkins in 1973, two U.S. Air Force officers and a local employee of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran in 1975, and three American employees of Rockwell International in 1976.⁶ The PMOI counters that its top leadership was in prison at the time of these killings and that they were the work of radical Marxist opposition factions within the PMOI.⁷ The State Department and scholars of the period say the PMOI also supported the holding of the American hostages and saw the hostage crisis as an opportunity to discredit Iranian liberals and the United States.⁸ The State Department emphasizes these points in justifying its refusal to meet with the organization. The PMOI claims it did not support the hostage taking and that the regime used the crisis as a tool for cracking down on its internal opponents, including the PMOI. The PMOI also denies that it is anti-American and publicly supports current U.S.-sponsored Middle East peace efforts.

Strategy, Tactics, and Capabilities of the PMOI: Since its failed September 1981 uprising against the regime, the PMOI has been engaged in armed struggle against the regime, including the use of political violence. In Iran, the Mojahedin maintains clandestine cells that spread PMOI literature, gather information on regime activities, and conduct operations against regime officials and installations. For example, in October 1992, the PMOI claimed responsibility for planting a bomb in the headquarters of the Revolutionary Guard, the regime's principal instrument for combatting the PMOI. The PMOI also claims to have played a major role in anti-regime demonstrations during 1992, but many analysts, although acknowledging some PMOI involvement, do not believe that the PMOI has sufficient strength or support to seriously threaten the regime's grip on power. Despite its weaknesses, the PMOI's dedicated followers have been resilient and persistent, defying regime efforts to eliminate the organization within Iran. The regime is genuinely concerned about PMOI activities in Iran and PMOI supporters are a major target of Iran's internal security apparatus. The group claims that 100,000 of its members have been killed and 150,000 imprisoned by the regime, but these figures are believed to be somewhat exaggerated. Noting that the Mojahedin is not the only victim of its struggle against the Iranian regime, in mid-1991, a State Department spokesman said that the PMOI's use of violence against the regime has resulted in the deaths of 10,000 Iranians, most of whom were innocent civilians.⁹

Operating through the National Council of Resistance umbrella group, the Mojahedin maintains offices throughout Western Europe and the United States which attempt to expose alleged regime abuses and curb foreign governments' relations with or support for the Tehran government. The organization frequently conducts anti-Iranian regime marches and demonstrations in those countries, publicizing the regime's alleged human rights abuses. On several occasions, it has attacked Iran's embassies abroad, following Iranian actions against the organization. The PMOI attacked Iranian missions in ten countries, including the United States, in April 1992, following an Iranian air strike on its base across the Iranian border with Iraq,¹⁰ and incited significant protest outside Iran after the Iranian regime assassinated Masud Rajavi's brother, Kazem, in Switzerland on April 24, 1990.¹¹ Over the past year, the PMOI has also attempted to raise additional concerns in the United States and Western Europe about Iran's weapons of mass destruction programs and its military intentions. Many of its reports remain unconfirmed, but some analysts note that the PMOI occasionally does uncover sensitive information on Iranian activities¹² and that its information should not be automatically rejected.

The PMOI's military arm is the National Liberation Army (NLA), which was officially formed in 1987 after France, as a gesture toward the Iranian government in 1986, expelled the PMOI leadership. Iraq, then in an all out war with Iran, granted the organization a new home. The NLA is based about sixty miles from the border with Iran and claims 40,000 troops under its command, although analysts believe the figure is probably closer to about 15,000. About one-third of the NLA's combat forces and unit commanders are women. It has perhaps a few hundred tanks as well as other heavy equipment captured from Iran during the Iran-Iraq war.¹³ Journalists who have visited NLA bases reported seeing that some of the NLA's tanks were not working.¹⁴ Lighter weaponry and ammunition is believed to be supplied largely by Iraq.¹⁵ The group repeatedly claims that a "final offensive" that will liberate Iran is imminent, but most analysts doubt that the NLA can conduct a major offensive against an Iranian military of about 600,000. The NLA has, however, successfully fended off several small offensives against them by Iran's Revolutionary Guards, most notably those connected to the March 1991 Shiite uprisings against Saddam Hussein. Moreover, it is widely believed that the NLA is largely under the control of Iraq and, even if capable, would not be able to carry out an offensive into Iran without at least the tacit approval of Saddam Husayn.¹⁶ Saddam also has apparently used the NLA as a bargaining chip in relations with Iran, unleashing the group when relations deteriorate and reining it in when relations improve.

Sources of External Support: Just as the extent of the PMOI's support within Iran is not precisely known, neither is its strength among Iranian exiles. Because of its anti-Shah past, the PMOI is not close to major monarchist opposition figures such as the former Shah's son (Reza Pahlavi). Although he co-founded the NCR with Rajavi, former President Bani-Sadr has not been active as an opposition figure and is not currently identified as a member of the 22 person NCR. The PMOI/NCR also does not appear close to the loyal opposition National Freedom Movement, headed by the Islamic Republic's first Prime Minister, Mehdi Bazargan, and which is allowed to operate within Iran. A few nationalist and democratic parties, such as the National Democratic Front of Iran, have joined the NCR. Among Iranian exiles, the former Shah's son probably enjoys more popular support than the Mojahedin, but the PMOI's followers, drawn generally from the intelligentsia, are said to be more dedicated and zealous than those of the other groups.

Among governments in the Middle East, Baghdad is the PMOI's most visible supporter, offering the group a base of operations, as well as safe haven, and weapons. Many observers claim that Iraq is the PMOI's chief financial source, even though the PMOI lists its primary financial sources as merchants inside Iran, Iranian exiles, and a network of businesses in Europe.¹⁷ There have also been unconfirmed reports that Saudi Arabia is contributing to the PMOI. However, the Mojahedin's close ties to the Iraqi Government—Saudi Arabia's primary adversary—casts significant doubt on those reports. There are also indications that Turkey had been supporting the PMOI; in a September 1992 security agreement with Iran, Turkey pledged not to allow Iranian opposition groups to operate from Turkey.¹⁸ Many observers also note that, because of the large number of Iranians in or passing through Turkey, the PMOI has a significant information gathering network there.

Relations With the Administration and Congress: Since 1987, the PMOI has been registered with the U.S. Department of Justice under the Foreign Agents Registration Act of 1938, as amended. However, the Administration refuses to meet with representatives of the organization. In response to an inquiry by Representative Lee Hamilton, Chairman of the Europe and Middle East Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, the State Department explained its position as "stem[ming] from the PMOI's use of terrorism and its aim of seeking the violent overthrow of the current Iranian regime." The Department also lists Mojahedin attacks on U.S. personnel in Iran before the revolution, the group's support for the takeover of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran in 1979, and the PMOI's current ties to the Iraqi Government as justifications.¹⁹ State notes the group's past acceptance of some aspects of Marxism but indicates that ideology is not the basis of U.S. opposition to the group. The PMOI charges that the Department position is the product of a pledge to the Iranian Government in the U.S.-Iran arms dealings of 1985-86,²⁰ and objects to the Department's characterization of the organization.

Many Members of Congress have been more supportive of the PMOI, perhaps because of the significant Iranian exile community in the United States. The PMOI's warmer reception in Congress may also flow from continuing popular resentment of Iran over its seizure of the American hostages in 1979. Some Members may believe that any alternative is preferable to the current regime in Tehran. As examples, Representative Mervyn Dymally has occasionally circulated letters supporting the PMOI or its goals; congressional letters such as these have sometimes attracted close to two hundred signatures by House members. In the belief that all sides of the debate on U.S. policy toward Iran should be represented, Representative Dymally also has hosted speaking engagements for PMOI representatives. In October 1992, Senator Hank Brown led 61 Senate colleagues in urging the U.N. General Assembly to condemn human rights violations in Iran and "supporting the Iranian People's Resistance."²¹ PMOI literature frequently trumpets the group's meetings with Members and their expressions of support for the organization, no matter how qualified that support.

²The PMOI claims its current leadership is also drawn from the Islamic rather than the Marxist wing of the organization. The group publicly espouses democracy, protection for Iran's minorities, internationally recognized standards of human rights, and free market economics. However, many critics question whether or not the group has really abandoned its more authoritarian roots and believe that the group is concealing its true views in order to curry international support in toppling the Tehran regime.

DON'T LOOK TO IRAN'S MUJAHEDDIN FOR HELP

I agree with William Raspberry on "The Threat From Tehran" [op-ed, Nov. 11]. Iran's military buildup and religious proselytizing pose a threat to regional stability and U.S. security interests as well as to the security of Iran itself. Indeed, the clerical regime has neglected democratic principles, human rights and the general wellbeing of its people in the pursuit of militant fundamentalism, terrorism and military supremacy. I further agree with Mr. Raspberry that the clerical regime should be replaced with a democratic one.

But I should emphasize that the People's Mujaheddin Organization is not the answer.

The People's Mujaheddin is a leftist revolutionary group categorized as a terrorist organization by the State Department. In the 1970s, the Mujaheddin assassinated a number of Americans in Iran: Air Force Brigadier Gen. Harold Price, Col. Lewis Hawkins, Col. Paul Schaefer and three civilian employees of Rockwell International.

The Mujaheddin carried out an aborted attempt to kidnap Ambassador Douglas A. MacArthur II in December 1970 in Tehran and bombed the offices of El Al, British Airways and the Jewish Emigration in Tehran.

The Mujaheddin also participated in the takeover of the U.S. Embassy and the taking of the American diplomats as hostages in Tehran and took credit for prolonging their ordeal.

The American public and the leadership should be aware that the People's Mujaheddin has been and is a tool of the Baghdad regime and receives financial, political and moral support from Saddam Hussein.

During the war between Iran and Iraq, the Mujaheddin went so far as to attack the Iranian armed forces from bases in Iraq.

The solution to the problem of Iran is to replace the despotic regime of Tehran with a democratic Western-oriented government that would promote peace and stability in the region and put an end to state-sponsored terrorism.

IRAN REBEL GROUP LOBBIES WELL, BUT IS IT ANTI-AMERICAN?

(By Morton M. Kondracke)

Having lobbied its way into favor on Capitol Hill, a controversial Iraq-based Iranian revolutionary group is making a strong play to gain official recognition from the incoming Clinton Administration.

But Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) is asking the FBI for a public report on the group, the People's Mujahedin of Iran (PMOI), charging that it has a "history of violence against American citizens." It is a charge that bears looking into by the President-elect.

A delegation of PMOI officials, including its foreign affairs director, attended the Democratic Leadership Council's dinner in Washington Dec. 8 and managed to make a brief presentation of its case and some literature to Clinton, his wife Hillary, and several top Congressional leaders.

Vice President-elect Al Gore, one of 62 Senators who signed a pro-PMOI letter Oct. 28, met for half an hour with the foreign affairs director, Mohammed Mohadessin, just before the election.

"With a new Administration, we believe it is time for a new approach toward Iran," a Mohadessin aide, Ali Safavi, told me. He indicated that the PMOI hopes, at a minimum, for reversal of a State Department ban on official contact with the group and, at best, for aid and recognition as the leading resistance group battling the fundamentalist government of Iran.

Safavi charged the Bush Administration with "appeasing the mullahs," who are bent on a policy of internal repression, terrorism, military domination of the Persian Gulf, and development of nuclear, chemical, and biological arsenals.

Administration officials admit that Iranian President Hashemi Rafsanjani has not, as they hoped, demonstrated more moderation than the late Ayatollah Khomeini. Iran is currently accused of trying to wreck the Mideast peace talks by prompting fundamentalist attacks on Israelis and of being one of the world's foremost sponsors of terrorism. The CIA recently confirmed there are signs that Iran is working on a nuclear capability.

Still, the State Department says it opposes the PMOI as a "leftist" group founded in opposition to Zionism and American "imperialism" and alleges it supported not only the assassination of several American military officers and civilians in Iran between 1973 and 1976, prior to the overthrow of the Shah in 1979, but also the seizure of the US embassy in November 1979.

But PMOI spokesmen claim their group is Islamic and democratic and, while certainly anti-Shah, had nothing to do with attacks on Americans. The group asserts that the assassinations took place when the PMOI's leader, Masoud Rajavi, was in jail and leadership of the group was seized by militant Marxists. Further, the US embassy, according to PMOI, was seized by Islamic militants who later became the Revolutionary Guards.

The group maintains an effective lobby in Washington. This summer, 219 House Members, led by Reps. Mervyn Dymally (D-Calif), Helen Bentley (R-Md), and Robert Torricelli (D-NJ), signed a statement denouncing Iranian human rights abuses and declaring that the PMOI-led National Resistance Council "is capable of establishing freedom and democracy in Iran."

The Senate letter that was signed by Gore and circulated by Sen. Hank Brown (R-Colo) cited the House action and support from 1,300 parliamentarians in 19 other countries.

But on Nov. 28, a Congressional Research Service report raised questions both about PMOI's military prowess and its dedication to democracy.

According to CRS scholar Kenneth Katzman, the PMOI-led National Liberation Army (NLA) "claims 40,000 troops under its command, although analysts believe the figure is probably closer to 15,000," as against 600,000 in Iran. "Moreover, it is widely believed that the NLA is largely under the control of Iraq, and, even if capable, would not be able to carry out an offensive into Iran without at least the tacit approval of Saddam Hussein," Katzman wrote.

Katzman says that Rajavi is an "authoritarian socialist" and notes that PMOI propaganda features pictures of him and his wife in the style of regimes dominated by cults of personality.

McCain, co-sponsor of tough sanctions legislation against Iran, wrote to FBI Director William Sessions on Dec. 15 asking for an update of a 1987 public report on PMOI, which alleged complicity in assassination of Americans and the embassy takeover.

"I am concerned that PMOI is playing an active role in lobbying the US Congress," McCain wrote, "under conditions where members have no way to learn the history of this organization," which he said involves "violence against American citizens, terrorism and financial ties to Iraq."

As a well-placed Congressional aide noted, "this is a three-cornered game between Iraq, Iran, and the PMOI. There are no good guys. There are only villains."

So while it may be that the Clinton Administration will find the PMOI worth supporting to harass an aggressively anti-western Iran, no decisions should be made before the facts are sorted out.

CAMPAIGN FOR DEMOCRACY AND HUMAN RIGHTS IN IRAN,
December 24, 1992.

DEAR SENATOR MCCAIN: Your tough sanctions legislation against the Islamic "Republic" of Iran and your stand against the "People's Mojahedin Organization" is quite commendable.

The PMOI which has been repudiated as a terrorist organization on numerous occasions by the United States Department of State in the last 20 years, has presented a grossly distorted picture of their movement and their gross acts of terrorism is without exaggeration feared and abhorred by the Iranian people.

Many facts concerning the unsavory nature of this so-called resistance movement should be presented to the honorable members of Congress who are horrified by the insane and reprehensible behavior of an Iranian leadership which has resorted to unprecedented acts of brutality, hostage taking and international terrorism. For example the fact that the resistance group being promoted was a committed supporter of Khomeini and until it began quarreling with the Mullahs in 1981, had in fact acted hand in hand with the Islamic regime to suppress all shades of liberal and democratic thought in Iran. It is also important to note that during both the Iran-Iraq War, as well as the Persian Gulf War, it had sided with Saddam Hussein first against their own people and later against the democratic alliance.

The solution to Iran's problems is the replacement of the current Rafsanjani-clerical Administration with one democratic inclination, responsive to popular aspirations, needs and priorities. Democratically minded Iranian opposition groups are working toward this goal.

We are looking forward to hear from you.
Respectfully Yours,

LAILA AMIR,
President.

IRANIAN COMMUNITY CENTER
IN ARIZONA,
Glendale, AZ, December 28, 1992.

Hon. Senator JOHN MCCAIN,
Senator of Arizona.

DEAR SENATOR MCCAIN: A recent article in the Washington Post has stirred up a controversy in our community. In the letter titled "Iranian Group Lobbying Clinton", the author, Mr. Kondracke, has attempted to undermine Mojahedin's legitimacy in their struggle for democracy and peace in Iran. Their diplomatic campaign which is merely to expose Khomeini's brutal regime and to introduce their just resistance, has been portrayed as fraud and deceiving, an accusation that has brought resentment in our community.

Our community was particularly hurt to find your name in the article supporting Mr. Kondracke's arguments particularly when we have been in contact with your office and have informed you of the situation.

After fourteen years of Khomeini, the world has realized Khomeini's crime against humanity, thanks to Mojahedin for their countless efforts to expose the regime. If it was not for the Mojahedin with their extensive support and connections within Iran, how would the truth by-pass the filters of a controlled and censored Iran. International organizations such as Amnesty International, when reporting on Iran, base their figures primarily on the Mojahedin. This illustrates their recognition and credibility.

The regime in Iran has been condemned repeatedly in the world community for the violations of human rights and export of terrorism. Iran's response to the condemnation has been to deny the charges on the basis that the information leading to condemnation has been produced by the Mojahedin. Thus clearly, the first beneficiary of this letter are the mullahs in Iran and consequently, the first victim will be the Iranian people who carry the bitter experience of 14 years of ruling of a reactionary, anti-western, and oppressive regime.

As Iranian-Americans, we are concerned with the situation in Iran and follow the events closely. We are well informed on the Mojahedin and are certain that the alleged charges in the letter are not true. Mojahedin have never been involved in any terrorist activities as suggested by Mr. Kondracke. They have strongly and repeatedly condemned any such action or one against the international laws and principles that they are striving and seeking for Iran. They are truly independent and have no financial or military ties to a foreign country or agency. They are deeply rooted in the Iranian people and enjoy popular support, among Iranian people as our community here in Arizona is a proof of that.

During the eighties, at the time when the Reagan-Bush administration was trying to renew its vows of friendship with Khomeini, the first prerequisite to any such relationship with Iran was denunciations of the Mojahedin. It was within this context that the 1987 FBI report came out. Therefore, except for Khomeini and its strategic friends, no one would believe that a movement with strong Islamic beliefs with many highly western (including the United States) educated members can possibly be "leftist" or "terrorist". Accusing the Mojahedin of such, is an insult to a nation who see their only hope for freedom in the Mojahedin.

There are two opposite scenarios in Iran. One is represented by the Khomeini regime which has proven to be only a potential for further instability for the region with no chance of any moderation. The second scenario which lies with the Mojahedin, is the only alternative for this troubled but strategically important region of the world. Stability will only return when Iran is freed. Only the Mojahedin can bring a lasting democracy to Iran and peace and stability to the region. Therefore, it is in the best interest of the United States as well as the Iranian people that the United States take a firm standing, against mullahs in Iran and to support the Mojahedin.

Mojahedin have been clear on the future of Iran. Their standing on issues has been out for many years. We as Iranian-Americans are all familiar with their goals. They have enjoyed international support. It just seems impossible that the whole world is misinformed. The "conditions" to study the past history and present program is all public information easily accessible to all. Thus, the recent support by the United States Congress is not due to their lack of knowledge but rather to their commitment to human principles.

The current situation in the region is volatile and changes can go in any direction. A greater focus and attention on the situation is required. We would like to send representatives and discuss with you concerning the situation and the Mojahedin. We hope to work together with you to resolve the misunderstandings.

Sincerely yours,

REZA MOHKAMI,
[And 5 others].

IRANIAN CULTURAL SOCIETY

OF NEW JERSEY,

Toms River, NJ, December 28, 1992.

Ms. STACY MASON,
Roll Call, 900 2nd Street, NE.,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MS. MASON: When finally there seem to be a change in the US policy toward Iran and the Iranian Resistance, elements and supporters of the Mullah's regime in Iran are at work to pursue a campaign of misinformation aiming at discrediting the new policy. Reading Mr. Kondracke's article in the December 21, 1992 issue of the Roll Call, I see that this misinformation campaign has found its way into his work as well.

Without going into details of the State Department "fact sheet" against the Resistance which has been rebutted by the Resistance representatives in the US, I just would like to emphasize on a fact that there is no alternative beside the National Council of Resistance to the regime in Tehran. The choice is between a regime which presents the biggest threat to US vital interests in the Persian Gulf region and the peace and security of the entire Middle East, and a democratic independent resistance led by Mr. Masoud Rajavi which will undo what Khomeini did in Iran. Denouncing the Iranian Resistance from any standpoint, in practical terms, means supporting the current regime.

The last three US presidents have made misinformed decisions with regard to the Mullah's regime which have damaged these presidencies one way or another. President-elect Clinton cleverly understands this and is determined to make a US policy more in line with US and world interests in that region. The recent meetings between Resistance representatives and members of the incoming Administration demonstrate the new policy. This new policy is in the interest of both nations and in particular in interest of Iranian-Americans who wish close and friendly relations between the American government and a new democratic government in their original homeland.

Time has come for this change and no efforts on the part of the Mullahs or their surrogates can stop it.

Sincerely,

JAVAD BOROUHAND.

1992 WOMEN ON THE MOVE CORPORATE AWARD RECIPIENT

Tucson Electric Power Company, an investor-owned electric utility which serves the Tucson area, has struggled over the last several years to restructure the Company in order to avoid a bankruptcy and the attendant negative impact on our community. The Company's lengthy and complicated financial restructuring has been accompanied by a less public, but equally significant internal redirection and restructuring.

Tucson Electric Power's (TEP) new mission focuses on customer service, employee utilization, shareholder value and committing resources to help improve the community. Little time has been wasted in implementation. Soon after his election as President and CEO of TEP Charles E. Bayless added two women to the top management team in the positions of Vice President and Controller and Vice President of Finance. At the same time, two other women were entrusted with legal and strategic planning responsibilities, each crucial to the success of the financial restructuring of the Company's future.

Diversity is being addressed in many ways. The Cultural Awareness Resource and Education (CARE) Committee is charged with researching and making recommendations regarding employee cultural diversity issues, and an aggressive affirmative action program is designed to place females and minorities in positions in which they are currently underrepresented. Human resources policies continually examine work group opportunities for including a diverse mix of employees. Reflective of these TEP policies is the fact that the Board of Directors now includes two businesswomen and a Hispanic businessman.

New training programs, available to employees at all levels, stress communications skills, interpersonal relationships and diversity issues. With customer diversity in mind, primary customer information has been made more usable through Spanish language translations in larger type. Additionally, a range of beneficial low-income and senior citizen energy assistance programs have been added.

Community relations has also become a priority. The Community Action Team (CAT) was formed to encourage and publicize volunteer opportunities in the community. A modest corporate contributions program is targeted at cultural diversity and the environment as well as human needs in the community. And more employees are serving on non-profit boards of directors with the Company's full support and encouragement.

While environmental concerns are not new at TEP, the Company's educational programs on energy conservation and the environment have been expanded significantly over the past two years, reaching 2,700 local fourth-graders and their families through a hands-on energy conservation program, and another 3,000 K-12 students with topics ranging from electrical safety to respect for the environment.

An increased emphasis has been placed on educating and encouraging customers to use less electricity more wisely. These residential and business incentive and rebate programs create a basis for long-term strategies which address both environmental solutions and shareholder value.●

SENIOR OLYMPIC FESTIVAL

● Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, on January 23, 1993, the 9th Annual Senior Olympic Festival will commence in Tucson, AZ. This event, sponsored by Del Webb's Sun City Tucson and Senior Care from Intergroup of Arizona, is a unique opportunity for some 2,300 athletes over the age of 50 to engage in a spirited week of friendly competition.

Over a week's time and 90 events later, these participants will compete to qualify at the State and possibly the National Senior Olympics. The Senior Olympics have demonstrated that age is not a factor for those individuals who choose to live a long, healthy, and vivacious life. These events encourage others to not only exercise but lead healthier lifestyles in general.

Mr. President, I ask that my colleagues join me in offering support and luck to all the participants at the festival and in their continuing commitment to life and fitness.●

REMOVAL OF INJUNCTION OF SECRECY—TREATY DOCUMENT NO. 103-2 AND TREATY DOCUMENT NO. 103-3

Mr. MITCHELL. As in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that the injunction of secrecy be removed from the following two treaties transmitted to the Secretary of the Senate on January 19, 1993, by the President of the United States:

Treaty with Argentina Concerning the Reciprocal Encouragement and Protection of Investment (Treaty Document No. 103-2); and Treaty with Bulgaria Concerning the Encouragement and Reciprocal Protection of Investment (Treaty Document No. 103-3).

I further ask that the treaties be considered as having been read the first time; that they be referred, with accompanying papers, to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed; and that the President's message be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The messages of the President are as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith the Treaty Between the United States of America and the Argentine Republic Concerning the Reciprocal Encouragement and Protection of Investment, with Protocol, signed at Washington on November 14, 1991; and an amendment to the Protocol effected by exchange of notes at Buenos Aires on August 24 and November 6, 1992. I transmit also, for the information of the Senate, the report of the Department of State with respect to this treaty.

This is the first bilateral investment treaty with a Latin American country to be transmitted to the Senate since the announcement of my Enterprise for the Americas Initiative in June 1990. The treaty is designed to protect U.S. investment and encourage private sector development in Argentina and to support the economic reforms taking place there. The treaty's standstill and roll-back of Argentina's trade-distorting performance requirements are precedent-setting steps in opening markets for U.S. exports. In this regard, as well as in this approach to dispute settlement, the treaty will serve as a model for our negotiations with other South American countries.

The treaty is fully consistent with U.S. policy toward international investment. A specific tenet, reflected in this treaty, is that U.S. investment abroad and foreign investment in the United States should receive fair, equitable, and nondiscriminatory treatment. Under this treaty, the Parties also agree to international law standards for expropriation and expropriation compensation; free transfers of funds associated with investments; and the option of the investor to resolve disputes with the host government through international arbitration.

I recommend that the Senate consider this treaty as soon as possible, and give its advice and consent to ratification of the treaty, with protocol, as amended, at an early date.

GEORGE BUSH.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 19, 1993.

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith the Treaty Between the United States of America and the Republic of Bulgaria Concerning the Encouragement and Reciprocal Protection of Investment, with Protocol and related exchange of letters, signed at Washington on September 23, 1992. I transmit also, for the information of the Senate, the report of the Department of State with respect to this Treaty.

The Treaty will help to encourage U.S. private sector involvement in the Bulgarian economy by establishing a favorable legal framework for U.S. investment in Bulgaria. The Treaty is fully consistent with U.S. policy toward international investment. A specific tenet, reflected in this Treaty, is that U.S. investment abroad and foreign investment in the United States should receive fair, equitable, and nondiscriminatory treatment. Under this Treaty, the Parties also agree to international law standards for expropriation and expropriation compensation; free transfers of funds associated with investments; and the option of the investor to resolve disputes with the host government through international arbitration.

I recommend that the Senate consider this Treaty as soon as possible, and give its advice and consent to ratification of the Treaty, with Protocol and related exchange of letters, at an early date.

GEORGE BUSH.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 19, 1993.

REPRINTING OF SENATE DOCUMENTS—SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 4; SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 5; AND SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 6

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I send three resolutions relating to the reprinting of Senate documents to the desk and I ask unanimous consent that they be considered en bloc; agreed to; and the motion to reconsider the passage of the resolutions, en bloc, be laid upon the table, and that statements I have on each resolution be printed at an appropriate place in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

So the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 4) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution, with its preamble, is as follows:

S. CON. RES. 4

Whereas informed research on the history and operations of the United States Congress depends on full access to existing scholarly studies of its former members, as well as to their published papers and other writings; and

Whereas no recent compilation of these significant research resources presently exists: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there shall be printed as a Senate document, the book entitled "Senators of the United States: A Historical Bibliography" prepared by the Senate Historical Office under the supervision of the Secretary of the Senate.

SEC. 2. Such document shall include illustrations, and shall be in such style, form, manner, and binding as directed by the Joint Committee on Printing after consultation with the Secretary of the Senate.

SEC. 3. In addition to the usual number of copies, there shall be printed 5,000 copies for the use of the Office of the Secretary of the Senate.

SENATORS OF THE UNITED STATES: A HISTORICAL BIBLIOGRAPHY

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, today I am submitting a resolution authorizing printing of a Senate document entitled "Senators of the United States: A Historical Bibliography." From 1789 to the present, over 1,800 Americans have served in the U.S. Senate. The careers of these individuals, as reflected in their writings and scholarly studies of their legislative service, provide detailed and personal illustrations of the workings, customs, and practices of the Senate.

There is at present no compilation to assist legislators, citizens, and scholars in identifying and locating these invaluable research resources. The Senate Historical Office has prepared "Senators of the United States: A Historical Bibliography" to provide researchers with a reference guide to works by and about former Members, and to stimulate further scholarship on the Senate's history. The bibliography lists biographies, articles, monographs, and doctoral dissertations that profile the lives and legislative service of approximately 1,100 former Senators, with special emphasis on modern, scholarly works. It also includes collected writings, autobiographies, diaries, and other published works by former Members.

So the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 5) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to:

The concurrent resolution, with its preamble, is as follows:

S. CON. RES. 5

Whereas informed research on the United States Congress depends heavily on access to the office files, personal papers, oral history interview transcripts, and associated memorabilia of its former members;

Whereas the Senate in 1983 and the House of Representatives in 1988 have published well-received guides to these materials; and

Whereas thousands of new entries have been added to the Senate's 1983 edition and supplies of this award-winning reference guide have been exhausted: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there shall be printed as a Senate document, the book entitled "Guide to Research Collections of Former United States Senators" prepared by the Senate Historical Office under the supervision of the Secretary of the Senate.

SEC. 2. Such document shall include illustrations, and shall be in such style, form, manner, and binding as directed by the Joint Committee on Printing after consultation with the Secretary of the Senate.

SEC. 3. In addition to the usual number of copies, there shall be printed 5,000 additional copies for the use of the Office of the Secretary of the Senate.

GUIDE TO RESEARCH COLLECTIONS OF FORMER UNITED STATES SENATORS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, in 1983 the Senate published the first edition of a reference book entitled "Guide to Research Collections of Former United States Senators, 1789-1982." This path-breaking work for the first time pulled together information about the locations and availability of over 3,500 senatorial collections in more than 350 research institutions throughout the United States. These collections, include office files personal papers, oral history transcripts, photographs, and memorabilia.

Research for this volume was conducted by the then only available method, a survey sent to the administrators of these collections. Now, more than a decade later, comprehensive national electronic data bases offer a wealth of additional information, including scores of previously unidentified collections and more accurate descriptions of already known collections.

The 1983 edition is now out of print. It is therefore timely to incorporate this new information in an updated guide that may be distributed to libraries, large and small, to facilitate research in the history of the Senate and the Nation that it serves.

So the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 6) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution, with its preamble, is as follows:

S. CON. RES. 6

Whereas the United States Constitution, in Article I, section 5, provides that "Each House shall be the Judge of the Elections, Returns and Qualifications of its own Members" and that "Each House may . . . punish its Members for disorderly Behaviour, and, with the Concurrence of two thirds, expel a Member";

Whereas the Senate has sought faithfully to exercise these constitutional requirements of self-discipline through its more than two-hundred-year history;

Whereas the Senate, beginning in 1885, has periodically published compilations of its election, expulsion, and censure cases for the guidance of members and the American people; and

Whereas the most recent edition is now twenty years out of date: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there shall be printed as a Senate document, the book entitled "Senate Election, Expulsion, and Censure Cases" prepared by the Senate Historical Office under the supervision of the Secretary of the Senate.

SEC. 2. Such document shall include illustrations, and shall be in such style, form, manner, and binding as directed by the Joint Committee on Printing after consultation with the Secretary of the Senate.

SEC. 3. In addition to the usual number of copies, there shall be printed with suitable binding 3,000 copies for the use of the Senate, to be allocated as determined by the Secretary of the Senate.

SENATE ELECTION EXPULSION, AND CENSURE CASES

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, today I am submitting a resolution authorizing printing of a Senate document entitled "Senate Election, Expulsion, and Censure Cases." The Senate first published this document more than a century ago in 1885. Revised editions were issued in 1903, 1913, 1940, 1962, and 1973. The Senate Historical Office has recently updated this important reference work and has rewritten each of the more than 170 cases described in the 1973 edition to include information on the historical context of the individual disputes.

REAPPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY LEGAL COUNSEL

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senator DOLE, I send a resolution to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the resolution.

The legislation clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 20) reappointing Kenneth U. Benjamin, Jr. as deputy Senate legal counsel.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution is considered and agreed to.

So the resolution (S. Res. 20) was agreed to as follows:

S. RES. 20

Resolved, That the reappointment of Kenneth U. Benjamin, Jr. to be Deputy Senate Legal Counsel, made by the President pro tempore of the Senate this day, shall be effective January 3, 1993, and the term of service of the appointee shall expire at the end of the One Hundred Fourth Congress.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. DOLE. I move to lay the motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AUTHORIZING TESTIMONY AND REPRESENTATION OF SENATE LEGAL COUNSEL

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and the distinguished Republican leader, Mr. DOLE, I send to the desk a resolution authorizing testimony and authorizing representation by Senate legal counsel and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will report the resolution.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 21) to authorize testimony and to authorize representation by the Senate legal counsel.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, in Willey v. Riley, et al., Case No. LA 18962, pending in the Iowa district court for Linn County, a former member of Senator GRASSLEY's staff is the plaintiff in a dispute over his employment contract with his former law firm. In anticipation of having Senator GRASSLEY provide general character testimony at the trial of this matter, the plaintiff placed Senator GRASSLEY on a witness list. The defendant has now requested the opportunity to depose the Senator in advance of trial. This resolution would authorize Senator GRASSLEY's deposition testimony in this case, except as to matters for which a privilege should be asserted, and would authorize the Senate legal counsel to represent Senator GRASSLEY in connection with his testimony.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEVIN). Without objection, the resolution and its preamble are both agreed to.

So the resolution (S. Res. 21) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, is as follows:

S. RES. 21

Whereas, the parties in Willey v. Riley, et al., No. LA 18962, pending in the Iowa district court for Linn County, seek the deposition testimony of Senator Grassley;

Whereas, by Rule VI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, no Senator shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave;

Whereas, by the privileges of the Senate of the United States and Rule XI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, no evidence under the control or in the possession of the Senate can, by administrative or judicial process, be taken from such control or possession but by permission of the Senate;

Whereas, when it appears that evidence under the control or in the possession of the Senate is needed for the promotion of justice, the Senate will take such action as will promote the ends of justice consistent with the privileges of the Senate;

Whereas, pursuant to sections 703(a) and 704(a)(2) of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, 2 U.S.C. sections 288b(a) and 288c(a)(2), the Senate may direct its counsel to represent Members of the Senate with respect to requests for testimony made to them in their official capacities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That Senator Grassley is authorized to testify at a deposition in Willey v. Riley, et al., Case No. LA 18962 (Iowa D.Ct.), except when his attendance at the Senate is necessary for the performance of his legislative duties, and except concerning matters for which a privilege should be asserted.

SEC. 2. The Senate Legal Counsel is authorized to represent Senator Grassley in connection with his testimony in the case of Willey v. Riley, et al.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. DOLE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

THE INAUGURAL CEREMONIES

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, and Members of the Senate, yesterday we inaugurated President Clinton and Vice President GORE in a moving ceremony. That ceremony symbolizes one of the greatest strengths of our democracy—the peaceful transition of power. The President's statement was a powerful call to action to deal with the pressing needs of our Nation.

Though the program was relatively brief, it involved countless hours of preparation on logistics, construction of the platform, ticket distribution, preparation for the luncheon in Statuary Hall, and many other tasks.

Many people were involved in these preparations, but the chairman of the Joint Congressional Committee on Inaugural Ceremonies, the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. FORD] carried the major burden of making the arrangements for this historic occasion. He performed his responsibilities with his characteristic good humor, fairness, and efficiency—the same traits which he has brought to bear in handling his duties as Democratic whip. I offer my congratulations to Senator FORD on a job well done. He even managed to deliver on his promise that it would not rain.

In addition to Senator FORD, I also wish to congratulate the distinguished Senator from Alaska, Senator TED STEVENS. His attention to detail and the tenacity with which he tackles any project, or issue, were evident in the outstanding success of this endeavor. I wish to express my gratitude to Senator STEVENS and thank him for all of his good work.

I would also like to thank the other members of the Joint Inaugural Committee, those who served on that committee besides Senators FORD, STEVENS and myself. They were Speaker FOLEY; majority leader GEPHARDT, and minority leader MICHEL. Senator FORD and the committee were ably assisted by the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, as well as personnel from the executive branch.

I offer my appreciation and gratitude to everyone who worked on the arrangements for the inauguration. The tireless efforts of all involved, particularly those of the chairman, Senator FORD and the ranking member, Senator STEVENS, resulted in a memorable event for the entire Nation.

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, if there is no further business to come before the Senate, I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess as previously ordered.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 7:08 p.m., recessed until Friday, January 22, 1993, at 10 a.m.
