I. PURPOSE

Existing Federal law has not been sufficiently effective in preventing youth violence or in ensuring the punishment of juvenile offenders. The costs of these failures in human and monetary terms on American society is enormous. Today, young people are the most violent segment of society, and there is little reason to believe that a continuation of present Federal policy is likely to reduce youth crime.

The Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention (OJJDP) has been successful in implementing the mandates that have safeguarded the rights of young people in the criminal justice system. Nonetheless, it continues to focus on those mandates while ineffective prevention programs and inadequate punishments fail to stop a dramatic increase in youth crime, and violent youth crime in particular.

S. 1952 seeks to make the most significant changes in the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act (JJDPA) since its original enactment in 1974. The legislation renames OJJDP as the Office of Youth Violence Reduction and limits its authority to awarding grants and ensuring compliance with statutory requirements. The stature of the National Institute of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention (NIJJDP) is enhanced, as are its responsibilities and budgetary authority. These changes are designed to ensure that the Federal Government’s policy toward youth violence is focused on those activities that the Federal Government can perform best, that are appropriately Federal, and that, while exceedingly important, would be unlikely to be undertaken by State or local levels of government. Specifically, because OJJDP has not adequately performed its functions of, nor been adequately funded to undertake, research, evaluation, and dissemination of information concerning successful youth crime prevention programs, the bill emphasizes these roles for NIJJDP.

Second, S. 1952 eliminates many bureaucratic and procedural requirements of current law that in the Committee’s view serve no purpose, makes more flexible each of the remaining mandates, and expands the purposes of the current law’s formula grants to recognize that prevention and intervention can be enhanced if graduated punishments are made a mainstay of the juvenile justice system. Third, the legislation reauthorizes the Runaway and Homeless Youth Act and Missing Children’s Assistance Act. And fourth, the legislation repeals authorizations for programs for which there is little or no evidence of success in preventing youth violence and reallocates those funds to research, evaluation, technical assistance, training, and dissemination of information concerning scientifically evaluated crime prevention programs.

II. LEGISLATIVE HISTORY

Congress enacted the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act in 1974 in response to conditions then prevalent in the juvenile justice system in the States. Spurred by reports of dangerous conditions in which juveniles accused or convicted of crimes, or even offenses that would not be crimes if committed by an adult, were housed, Congress passed legislation to provide States assistance with juvenile justice. As a condition of receipt of these funds, States were required to comply with two original mandates, later expanded to four, that protected the rights of accused and adjudicated juveniles. The legislation also established OJJDP and directed it to dispense formula grants to States and monitor their compliance with the mandates. In addition, the legislation established within OJJDP a research, demonstration, evaluation, and information dissemination component. Congress has reauthorized the legislation in 1980, 1984, 1988, and 1992. In each reauthorization, new mandates have been added, and new Federal discretionary grant programs have been created, but the basic approach of the statute has remained largely unchanged.

Unfortunately, while current legislation achieved the goals of protecting youth, it has not been able to address the changed nature of the problem that exists today. Despite the effort to establish a Federal entity to conduct research on the subject, and in part due to a shortage of resources, little more is known about addressing youth violence today than was the case in 1974. In the meantime, even as the nature, scope, and severity of youth crime changed dramatically in the 1980's and 1990's, OJJDP focused excessively on mandates that relate to neither crime prevention nor punishment, and that, while important, have long ago been achieved.

For these reasons, the Subcommittee on Youth Violence conducted a series of hearings to reexamine the legislation with the recognition that substantial changes were required. It was the Subcommittee's intention to hold hearings, and then introduce a bill that reflected the testimony of the witnesses who appeared.

The Subcommittee held a field hearing in Memphis, TN, on February 15, 1996, on developing local solutions to youth violence. Witnesses included Johnny Rawls, a graduate of the Youth Habilitation Center; a youth offender; Francetta Harris, the owner of a Memphis hair salon; Charlesetta Temple of the Douglass Elementary School Alumni; Erika Davis, a high school student and founder of Students Against Violence Everywhere; the Honorable Jim Rout, mayor, Shelby County; the Honorable W.W. Herenton, mayor of Memphis; William Todd, president, Memphis Board of Education; the Honorable Kenneth Turner, juvenile judge; James Ball, administrator, Shelby County Training Center; the Honorable Victoria Coleman, U.S. attorney for the Western District of Tennessee; the Honorable John Pierotti, district attorney general; Dr. Robert Wood of the Agency for Youth and Family Development; Barbara Holden, executive director, Memphis and Shelby County Community Health Agency; Dan Michael, administrator, Court Appointed Special Advocates; Billy Crouch of Tennessee Home Ties; and Chaplain Carl Nelson of the Mark Luttrell Recreation Center.

On February 16, 1996, the Subcommittee held a field hearing in Nashville, TN, on developing State solutions to youth violence. The witnesses were the Honorable Don Sundquist, Governor of Tennessee; George Hattaway, the Commissioner of Youth Development; the Honorable Douglas Henry, Tennessee Senate; the Honorable Page Walley, Tennessee House of Representatives; the Honorable Beth Harwell, Tennessee House of Representatives; the Honorable Frank Buck, Tennessee House of Representatives; Charles Ballard, president, Institute for Responsible Fatherhood; Linda O'Neal, executive director, Tennessee Commission on Children and Youth; Charles Leach, Buddies of Nashville; George Phyfer, director of Juvenile Services, Corrections Corporation of America; Randy Dillon, coordinator, Child and Family Services; the Honorable Paul Wohlford, juvenile judge; the Honorable Randy Camp, juvenile judge; the Honorable Dan Speer, mayor, Pulaski, TN; the Honorable...
The Subcommittee held a hearing in Washington, DC, on February 28, 1996, on the changing nature of youth violence. The Subcommittee heard as witnesses Dr. James Alan Fox, dean, College of Criminal Justice, Northeastern University; Dr. Alfred Blumstein, professor, Carnegie-Mellon University; Dr. John J. Dilulio, Jr., director, Brookings Institution's Center for Public Management; Rev. Eugene F. Rivers III, a Boston pastor and a fellow at Harvard Divinity School; the Honorable Carol Kelly, juvenile judge; the Honorable C. Van Deacon, juvenile judge; Col. (retired) Thomas Gordon, New Castle County Police Chief; and Rev. Stephen Hare, Faith City Baptist Church.

On March 12, 1996, the Subcommittee held a hearing in Washington, DC on whether Federal strings on youth violence grants should be cut. Appearing as witnesses before the Subcommittee were Steve Carson, police chief, La Follette, TN; Byron Oedekoven, sheriff, Gillette, WY; Ray Luick, Wisconsin Office of Justice Assistance; William Woodward, director, Colorado Criminal Justice Department; Camille Anthony, executive director, Utah Commission on Crime and Juvenile Justice; Jerry Regier, director, Oklahoma Department of Juvenile Justice; Patricia West, director, Virginia Department of Youth and Family Services; and Robert Schwartz, chairman, American Bar Association Juvenile Justice Committee.

The Subcommittee held a hearing on May 8, 1996, in Washington, DC, on oversight of Federal juvenile justice programs. Testimony was received from Shay Bilchik, Administrator, OJJDP; Dr. Laurie Ekstrand, Associate Director, Administration of Justice Issues, U.S. General Accounting Office; Dr. Ira Schwartz, dean, School of Social Work, University of Pennsylvania; Lavonda Taylor of the Coalition of Juvenile Justice; Dr. Marvin Wolfgang, professor, University of Pennsylvania; Dr. Delbert Elliott, professor, University of Colorado; and Dr. Terrence Thornberry, professor, State University of New York at Albany.

The Subcommittee also held a field hearing in Albuquerque, NM, on July 2, 1996. Sixteen witnesses testified, including State and local government officials, nonprofit agency personnel, judges, police officers, and juvenile crime victims.

Senator Thompson, joined by Senator Biden, introduced S. 1952, on July 12, 1996.

DISCUSSION
A. CHANGES IN YOUTH CRIME

The Juvenile Justice Act was enacted at a time when juveniles tended to commit fewer, less violent, and less geographically dispersed crimes than today. The growing fear of crime in this country over the last 10 years tracks precisely the shocking escalation in the number of violent crimes committed by juveniles. Since 1985, the murder rate for adults older than 25 has decreased by 25 percent. Over the same period, homicides by persons 18–24 have risen 61 percent. And among those 14–17, despite recent figures showing a 1-year reduction, the corresponding increase is 172 percent.
Today, youths commit 300 percent more gun homicides than 10 years ago. Until the mid-1980’s, the murder rate of juveniles was the same as for adults over 25, and less than half the rate of persons 18–24. Today, it is four times higher than that of adults, and two-thirds the rate of young adults. These increases reflect increased violence by all segments of youth. African-American youth homicide rates have risen 120 percent over the last decade, but white youth homicide rates have also increased by 80 percent. The sad fact today is that arrest rates for violent crimes are higher for teenagers than for adults. As Professor Fox testified, “Conventional wisdom in criminology—that young adults generally represent the most violent-prone group—apparently needs to be modified in light of these disturbing changes.” Violent juvenile arrests soared 46 percent from 1989 to 1994, and there are today 150 percent more youth offenders than there were in 1984. While 1995 figures show a decline in youth crime rates, the Subcommittee learned that Memphis, for instance, also reported a 1-year drop after a decade of increase in youth violence, but the rate resumed its upward trend this year. The problem is pervasive and is likely to deteriorate further.

As Professor Fox testified, “It is doubtful that today’s improving crime picture will last for very long. This is the calm before the crime storm.” He noted that today’s violent youth are being succeeded by 39 million children in this country under age 10, a larger number than at any time since the baby boomers were in grade school. By 2005, there will be a 14-percent increase in teenagers, including a 17 percent increase in black teens and a 30-percent rise in the number of Hispanic teens. The current increase in youth violence has occurred even as there was a drop in the number of teenagers, but the teen population will rise for the next decade, Professor Fox points out. As Senator Biden’s December 1995 report, “Facing the Future,” documented, the Nation faces a significant increase in youth violence over this period simply due to demographics even if crime rates among young people stabilized. But given the increase in the number of at-risk youth over that time and the deterioration in societal institutions and norms, Professor Fox believes “our nation faces a future bloodbath of juvenile violence that will make 1996 look like the good old days.”

Both the nature of the problem and the conditions that have produced the increase in its severity and prevalence have changed remarkably since 1974. Commissioner Hattaway described how today’s young people are committing murder, rape, aggravated robbery, assault, weapons charges, and drug trafficking. Senator Henry cited studies showing that 10 percent of boys in high-risk neighborhoods had committed at least one street crime by age 7. The studies conclude that the earlier a person starts committing crimes, the more serious the crimes that are ultimately committed. Numerous witnesses testified that today’s young offenders frequently show no remorse at all for very serious crimes. Professor DiIulio testified that young offenders are so violent that adult prisoners are afraid of many of them. His interviews with adult prisoners attribute the existence of youth predators to “the absence of people, families, adults, teachers, preachers, coaches who would care enough about young males to nurture and discipline them.”

Judge Carol Kelly of Chicago spent 15 years as a prosecutor before becoming a juvenile court judge, “and I was never so frightened as I have been over the past two years in juvenile court.” She described the heartbreaking cases on her docket:

A ten year old boy who had acid poured on his head by another juvenile and is now hideously disfigured; a four year old girl who was stabbed 15 times by a 15 year old girl and who has scars all over her body; the 13 year old who was shot 11 times and may never walk again; the children who are sexually assaulted and abused by other children.

She also testified that there were numerous cases of children 7, 8, or 9 years of age who appeared before her court on gun possession charges. Although it was an extremely uncommon occurrence for her in adult court, Judge Kelly testified that there were a dozen juvenile cases against offenders that were dismissed because the accused was killed before trial.

Judge Kelly sentenced to prison the youngest person in America serving such a sentence. A 10- and an 11-year-old dropped a 5-year-old out a 14-story window because he would not steal candy for them. The 5-year-old's brother ran down 14 flights of stairs in a vain attempt to try to catch his brother. Judge Kelly told the Subcommittee that “many young violent offenders do not see anything wrong with their violent acts.” Col. Gordon testified to the growing violent nature of youth crime that occurs at ever earlier ages. In Delaware, a high school student recently brought a live grenade to school. A police officer was permanently disabled when a juvenile who had stolen a car refused to surrender and intentionally drove the car at the officer. The youth pinned the officer under the front wheels and nearly killed him. This juvenile showed no remorse.

Professor Fox and Professor Blumstein testified that the increased possession of guns by young people is particularly troubling. A 14-year-old is more willing to use a firearm over a trivial matter than is an adult because he does not fully appreciate the consequences and is less likely to exercise restraint.

Judge Turner and Judge Kelly testified that most crimes by youth today are related to the drug trade, as are a large number of child neglect and nonsupport cases. Professor DiIulio also attributes the increase in youth violence to drug abuse and child abuse. Drugs not only are involved in specific violent incidents, such as the drug-addicted 10-year-old in Judge Kelly's case, but they are a key factor in producing a generation of youth that is far more violent than its predecessors. Drug-addicted parents regularly abuse and neglect children, and crack babies that suffer physical addiction to drugs from in utero exposure often are unable to control their behavior. Judge Kelly attributes much of the increase in youth violence to the abuse and neglect that these and other at-risk individuals faced. Today, some young persons have grandparents who are addicted to drugs.

Witnesses before the Subcommittee tied the increase in youth violence to the decline of the family, neighborhoods, poor schools and a failed juvenile justice system, all of which are occurring as the influence grows of drugs, guns, and gangs. A Tennessee juvenile judge indicated that parents frequently fail to teach children respect for people or property. Instead, parents of troubled youth do what they want and leave their children to develop from their street environment. Mayor Speer described how parents and children have lost a sense of responsibility and respect for others. Judge Deacon and Rev. Rivers attributed that loss of responsibility to a government that has usurped the functions of communities, churches, and families, so that no one has to be responsible. Parental rejection and noninvolvement abounds. Judge Camp has ordered parents and children in the juvenile justice system to tell each other that they love each other. Many youths have told him that their mother had never told them that before.

Indeed, compared with 1974, children have far less contact with caring adults. Today, fewer children are being raised in traditional, two-parent families. Professor Fox told the Subcommittee that “as many as 57 percent of children in America do not have full-time parental supervision, either living with a single parent who works full-time or in a two-parent household with both parents working full-time.” The decline of the two-parent family has meant that children have more contact with adults who are potential abusers. Judge Deacon testified that the most dangerous person to a child is the mother’s boyfriend. Young people today are frequently unsupervised after school, and Professor Fox provided the Subcommittee with figures that the after-school hours are the prime time period for youth violence.

Even families that are nominally together may have little impact on keeping children away from crime. The younger offender in the case before Judge Kelly came from a two-parent family where both parents were substance abusers.

Professor Blumstein attributed the growth in youth violence to crack cocaine, which led to an increase in adult incarcerations. With fewer adults available to enter into the drug trade, more youth were recruited. By carrying drugs or drug money, youths needed protection and obviously could not call on the police for that protection. He traced the increase in youths carrying guns to this phenomenon, and the need for other youths to carry guns for protection.

Unlike 1974, youth violence occurs everywhere. Rural areas also face violent youth, Col. Gordon pointed out. Judge Deacon related that smaller communities have youth crime that has changed from shoplifting, joyriding, status offenses, and misdemeanors to rape, armed robbery, and gang activity. Rural communities, he said, “are no longer dealing with isolated, random acts of violence, but increasingly with hardened, violent young offenders. * * *” Chief Carson mentioned that sixth, seventh, and eighth graders in a small rural city have threatened assault on a teacher.

B. PREVENTION

Not only do the experts agree on the factors that are producing youth violence, they have similar ideas concerning the approaches that should be taken to address the problem. While Professor DiIulio and others recognized that the nature of today’s youth crime problem will mean the incarceration of more youths, he and all other witnesses concluded that youth violence will not be eradicated simply by incarcerating more juveniles. U.S. Attorney Coleman believes that it is simply not possible to lock up all offenders forever. Others, such as Judge Kelly, stress the enormous cost of juvenile incarceration, as well as the huge number of youth offenders, as reasons why America cannot simply build its way out of the youth violence problem. Professor Fox pointed out that increasing penalties alone will not solve the problem because the threat of punishment cannot deter youth that face violence every day, many of whom do not expect to live to adulthood.

Judge Wohlford testified that automatically waiving violent juveniles into adult courts has not been proved successful. Professor Fox remarked about the unfortunate fact that “we are obsessed with quick and easy solutions that will not work, such as the wholesale transfer of juveniles to the jurisdiction of the adult court, curfew laws, boot camps, three strikes, even caning and capital punishment, at the expense of long-term and difficult solutions that will work. " Professor Blumstein stressed that the bravado and peer pressure among the very young overwhelms the rational thought process necessary for harsh punishment to deter. Judge Kelly believes that locking up more and more juveniles without effective treatment will only produce “bigger, more violent criminals,” and that we should not treat youths the same as adults. The Committee agrees with Professor Blumstein that the demonstrably violent must be locked up. The Committee also agrees with Professor DiIulio that “incarceration is not the answer. I also believe, however, that, like it or not, we will be incarcerating more juvenile offenders over the next 5 or 10 years. I believe that it is important for Federal policy to at least help with, or at least get out of the way of State and local efforts to incarcerate violent and repeat juvenile criminals, no ifs, ands or buts.” However, the Committee accepts the judgement of Utah Commission Executive Director Camille Anthony that “[t]here should not be a widening of the net by the federal government mandating to states which offenses should be waived, nor should there be any attempt by the federal government to identify an age at which waivers should occur. Those policy determinations are properly left with State legislatures.”

Every witness told the Subcommittee that early intervention and prevention efforts are necessary. Professor Blumstein pointed out that because the societal institutions such as the family that provide socialization have declined, it is more important than ever that prevention be undertaken. Those efforts should begin earlier than has been tried before. Judge Kelly went to so far as to suggest that they begin from the moment of conception, but early on in any event. Judge Turner suggested targeting children who are now 5 to 10 years old, and an official with a local Big Brothers organization also stressed the importance of targeting the 6- to 10-year-old. There is a strong sense from juvenile judges and others that prevention is difficult after age 12 or thereabouts, or essentially the age when many young people enter the juvenile justice system. As Professor Fox testified, “We must act now while this baby-boomer generation is still young and impressionable, and will be impressed with what a teacher, a preacher, or some other authority figure has to say. If we wait until these children reach their teenage years, it may be too late to do much about it.”

“Early intervention efforts mean that large numbers of children must be reached. Although only a small percentage of youth will become the offenders that commit the vast majority of the crimes, it is impossible to identify such youth at the necessary age for intervention, Professor Fox testified. By the time the chronic offenders are identified through their actions, the likelihood of successful intervention is very low. Sadly, Judge Kelly testified, “We have so many 8-, 9-, 10-year-olds that are engaging in delinquent behavior, it is hard to figure out which one is the one that is going to end up killing somebody or doing something * * * like this. There are just so many children with guns at the age of 8, 9, 10 years old.”

Witnesses had different ideas about what kinds of prevention programs are worthwhile. Professor DiIulio believes that the kinds of prevention programs that should be turned to involve churches. Professor Fox prefers school and recreation programs, job training, family support, and mentoring. Professor Blumstein believes that success can be obtained through providing day care to high school mothers to continue their education and socialize their children.

The Committee has conflicting views about prevention programs aimed at strengthening families. The Committee agrees with Judge Deacon that working with a youth who is in the system, and then returning him to a poor home environment is “like washing a glove and immediately taking it and sticking it back in a bucket of tar.” While the importance of families cannot be overemphasized, the Committee wonders about the cases in which “families” do not exist to be strengthened or preserved. Working with families that can be saved is important, in part because of the poor quality of foster care in so many places. But given the substance and child abuse present in so many homes, the Committee thinks that too often the effort is made to keep a “family” together when the better course is to take that cleaned up glove and put it in another bucket altogether. As Mayor Swiney stated, “We’ve got to develop a system to enable authorities to remove children from hostile situations and violence in homes.” Judge Wohlford thinks efforts to speed the process of terminating parental rights might be effective approaches to produce permanent placements. Professor Wolfgang has found that “no clear evidence is available to prove” that family preservation programs have “long-term effects in reducing delinquency and violence.”

The Committee believes that prevention is important, although not a substitute to taking strong action against today’s violent young offenders. But it also believes that a very different type of Federal prevention effort should be undertaken than in the past, when the Federal Government dictated particular prevention programs with little or no basis for believing that they would be successful. As Mayor Speer stated, “In general, efforts to address youth violence problems have failed.* * * We as a nation have historically thrown money at these types [of] problems, maybe in hopes that [they] would just go away.* * * [W]hat we are doing now is not working.” The Committee hesitates to endorse any of these programs, for the reasons that follow in the discussion regarding research, although the Committee is encouraged by the results thus far of many private sector efforts to prevent youth violence, including the Boys and Girls Clubs and Big Brothers and Big Sisters.

The Committee also recognizes that the problem of youth violence is severe and Americans rightly want immediate reductions in these crimes. However, the Committee also accepts Professor Fox's cautions that the impact of prevention is not manifested in actual crime reduction for 8 to 10 years when the target audience is currently 6 to 8, and patience will be required to see through some of the promising approaches.

The Committee further realizes the political difficulty of taking long-term action to reduce the impact of the next wave of young people who are about to reach the age of committing serious crimes. The Committee chooses to retain the requirement that the formula grants be used at least 75 percent for prevention, although it broadens the definition of prevention and changes the use of the funds in relation to the mandates. As Professor Blumstein testified, the fact that benefits of prevention are so far in the future means that legislative bodies will tend to underfund these programs unless they are required to, even if they are effective. The Committee believes that political reality will work to encourage States to adopt the necessary actions to increase the punishment options for violent juveniles, such as longer sentences and secure facilities, as evidenced by the substantial number of state enactments to that effect, combined with changes in JJDPA that will avoid interference with such state policies.

C. FAILURES WITHIN THE JUVENILE JUSTICE SYSTEM

Based on witness testimony, the Committee believes that the juvenile justice system has failed to effectively punish youth offenders. This is true notwithstanding the assistance the JJDPA was supposed to provide to juvenile courts. A key element of prevention the Committee believes should be encouraged is the imposition of graduated sanctions on persons who begin to come into contact with the juvenile justice system. The Committee finds that the juvenile justice system today fails to impose punishment in a definite and systematic way on too many offenders, with the result that too many offenders who might be able to be turned around before becoming violent criminals are left to continue on their criminal path.

Judge Turner testified that 24 percent of juveniles in Tennessee had committed seven or more previous offenses. In Oklahoma, the average youth commits seven felonies before being placed in secure detention, and a similar situation exists in Virginia. One reason for this is that often nothing happens to juvenile offenders as a result of their appearance in juvenile court. The Committee is distressed that often nothing happens even if the youth commits a felony. Judge Kelly's young murderers were released to their (substance-abusing) parents numerous times after they built a long criminal history. The two had problems in school, constantly fought, and had numerous police contacts. The 10-year-old had been given probation for unlawful possession of a gun 9 days before he murdered the 5-year-old, the first occasion in which he had any punishment imposed at all.

The Committee is also concerned about the lack of space in which violent young people can be detained. Judge Camp testified that “I can’t get a kid in detention for anything less than drug dealing or weapons.” Professor DiIulio recited that 9,000 juveniles were arrested for violent crime in Florida, but the State held only 1300 juveniles in custody. The Committee thinks Federal policies that interfere with States’ ability to change this situation should themselves be changed.

Judge Deacon believes that swift sanctioning and followup is an approach that can turn some early offenders away from a career in crime. There must be consequences. Professor Elliott testified in favor of imposing consequences of some kind for every arrest. As Chief Carson stated, “[W]ith 98 percent of the children, you see a series of acts before he gets to the serious crime. If intervention comes early, we stand a better chance * * * of correcting the behavior.* * * Although it is true, as Judge Kelly points out, that many inner-city children could not possibly view time in a detention center where many of their friends already are placed as worse than the conditions of their home life, the Committee thinks Federal resources should be available, as part of prevention, to allow States to enable their juvenile justice systems to impose a consequence for every crime. On the whole, Oklahoma’s Director Jerry Regier, a former OJJDP Administrator, properly notes that youth must be held accountable from their earliest signs of delinquency, and young people must know “that when they violate the law * * * there will be a consequence to that violation.” The Committee believes that in a time when millions of young people receive no discipline from their families, the need for graduated sanctions in juvenile court has never been greater.

This does not mean that every offender must be locked up, and the requirement in the legislation that 75 percent of the formula grant be used for prevention purposes, including graduated sanctions, prevents the use of formula grants on incarceration. Graduated sanctions can be restitution, fines, or community service, for instance, or any other approach that will indicate that antisocial behavior will not be tolerated. If those sanctions are ineffective for particular individuals, then more severe penalties should be imposed after subsequent crimes. This approach also lets the system know earlier on who the more dangerous youth are, and can remove other offenders from the system altogether. The Committee is concerned, based on the testimony of young people, that after a young person is allowed to commit 10 or 20 offenses without consequence, there is little to stop the next offense. Moreover, if a youth receives no punishment until serious felonies are committed, then the only punishment he will ever receive is for a felony, whereas he might never have had to be incarcerated if the court had given him a less severe sentence for his earliest crime. Failure to impose graduated sanctions in this instance is not in the interest of the offender, the victim of the felony, or the society that has to pay the cost of secure detention.

Virginia’s Patricia West says that a graduated sanction should be “something that the juvenile views as a tangible consequence that we as the system put on them and think is a consequence,” and does not include probation. Rather, it must mean taking away something the juvenile enjoys, or requiring the juvenile to make an effort.

Law enforcement approaches can essentially act as graduated sanctions as well. For instance, Professor Fox discussed a Massachusetts law requiring that a youth possessing a gun be incarcerated for 6 months no matter what. Had the 10-year-old in Chicago been subject to that law, the 5-year-old might be alive today, even if the former still never received any punishment until his gun possession arrest. Interestingly, the New York Times reports that Boston has had no juvenile murdered thus far in 1996 as of August, which the Committee finds to be remarkable, and the article suggests that this law may be one reason. Professor Blumstein mentioned New York’s aggressive stop and frisk gun approach, which punishes kids for possessing guns before a violent crime is committed. In Charleston, S.C., Chief Reuben Greenberg gives $100 for tips on illegal guns, which has the same effect, as well as reducing brandishing of weapons for fear of being prosecuted or arrested. Graduated sanctions for youth violence reflects no more than the knowledge from police techniques in adult crimes, which have found that punishing “minor” offenses produces major declines in more serious offenses. The Committee believes that prevention of youth violence can be achieved by applying this record to juvenile courts, and that JJDPA funds should be available to states who wish to pursue these approaches.

D. THE MANDATES

Under JJDPA, in addition to numerous administrative requirements, participating States are required to adhere to four core mandates. First, status offenders, youths who commit offenses that would not be crimes if committed by an adult, are not to be securely detained. Second, States are not to detain juveniles arrested for nonstatus offenses in adult lockups, except that in rural areas, such detention is permissible for 24 hours if no acceptable alternative placement is available, with certain exceptions. Third, States are to separate juvenile offenders from incarcerated adults, and from part-time or full-time security adult prisoner staff or direct-care staff, which OJJDP has interpreted to require sight and sound separation. Fourth, States are to “address efforts to reduce the proportion of juveniles detained or confined in secure detention facilities, secure correctional facilities, jails, and lockups who are members of minority groups if such proportion exceeds the proportion such groups represent in the general population.”

The Committee believes that each of the core mandates under JJDPA needs to be made more flexible. OJJDP has interpreted these mandates too stringently, with results that the Committee finds were never contemplated by the JJDPA. Further, it believes that many other requirements of the JJDPA that are imposed on the States should be eliminated. Moreover, the Committee finds that the mandates as currently written and interpreted interfere with the imposition of graduated sanctions, a result it concludes must change. The Committee also believes that JJDPA and OJJDP are directed too much to accomplishing the core mandates rather than focusing on effective punishment and prevention.

While the main purpose of the mandates was to protect the physical safety of juvenile delinquents in jail, the regulatory interpretations of the mandates have unduly hindered the functioning of the juvenile justice system. As Barbara Holden of the Memphis and Shelby County Community Health Agency told the Subcommittee, “[W]e have done what those strings required and I am not sure we have gotten the results and the outcomes that we desired and we need to learn from that experience.” The Committee agrees with State legislators, State administrators of JJDPA funds, and Governor Sundquist that States must be given “ongoing flexibility” to meet the mandates, “rather than having a Washington designer prescribe a one-size-fits-all model from afar.” Representative Harwell testified, “Frankly, federal mandates and large bureaucratic programs are not working in the local towns and cities across Tennessee,” and the Committee believes this to be true in other States as well.

A number of witnesses testified about the excessive filing requirements, including the representative of Big Brothers, who found Federal paperwork to be far more difficult to complete than funding requests from the State. Professor DiIulio stated that there are “enormous numbers of regulatory weeds that strangle initiative, all kinds of bizarre paper-filing, imbecilic requirements.” Mayor Swiney told the Subcommittee, “It’s possible to administer a program completely out of its effectiveness,” and that is what the Committee believes OJJDP has done with these mandates.

The Committee also believes that the mandates have unnecessarily interfered with the effective and efficient operation of State juvenile justice systems in general, and juvenile correction facilities in particular. Professor Blumstein, who served on Pennsylvania’s State advisory group for 11 years, testified that “some of the mandates just got in the way of effective operation.” Professor DiIulio described OJJDP as “caught in something of an anti-incarceration time warp.” The situation has become so intolerable that Utah’s Camille Anthony related, “State leaders throughout the country are questioning whether it is sound fiscal and public policy to continue to comply with the costly mandates of a 21-year-old juvenile justice act for a return of a relatively few federal dollars.” Indeed, Wyoming has withdrawn from participating. Youth rights that lie behind the mandates may not be fully protected if States decide to pull out of JJDPA completely.

The Committee is quite concerned that the deinstitutionalization of status offender mandate causes severe unintended negative consequences. As many witnesses told the Subcommittee, truancy, a classic status offense, is “a gateway behavior leading to delinquency.” Judge Turner put it well when he stated that “while all truants are not delinquent, all delinquents have a history of truancy.” The current mandate on status offenders makes imposing consequences for a behavior that is far more serious than it appears unnecessarily difficult.

Judge Deacon testified that he has no place to put status offenders because of the mandates. If a runaway or truant is placed in nonsecure detention, “they run back.” Judge Camp noted poignantly, “They go home and brag to everybody about how they beat the system and let you get away with whatever they want to get away with.” Oklahoma’s Jerry Regier told the Subcommittee, “the mandates basically have hampered and restricted the ability to respond to the status offenders and the first-time offenders. We cannot sanction them effectively.” The Committee finds this intolerable, and the opposite of how the juvenile justice system should operate.

In addition, the status offender mandate often works against the interests of the offender. Virginia’s Patricia West testified that these individuals sometimes need to be securely detained because of an unstable home setting, truancy enforcement, the need to assess the underlying reasons causing the running away, and the risk to themselves of incorrigible behavior. Additionally, the cur-cent status offender mandate is impractical in rural areas that lack alternate placements or that confront inebriated juveniles.

The consequences of limiting options to deal with status offenders are serious. In Virginia, more than half of status offenders were rearrested within 3 years, and 85 percent of those were later charged with an offense more serious than a status offense. For these reasons, the Committee agrees that Senator Grassley is cor-correct in criticizing an OJJDP staff comment that securely detaining runaways was a “hideous thought.” Although the current mandate provides for a valid court order exception, the Subcommittee heard testimony that in practice, no judge is likely to issue an order that can be second-guessed by an administrative official. Yet, many judges believe that incarcerating a status offender for a weekend, for instance, might be very effective in stopping further delinquent behavior. The practical effect of the mandate as it is currently administered is that status offenders cannot be securely detained.
The Committee will not mandate that status offenders be detained, but it wants States that choose to do so to have some flexibility, while preserving the rights of these offenders.

The Committee believes that the jail removal mandate is similarly interfering with the imposition of graduated sanctions and is in need of modification. Chief Carson told the Subcommittee that under the jail removal mandate, a police officer has to stay in the presence of the juvenile, because no place satisfying the mandate exists in a rural area to put the offender. As Sheriff Oedekoven and Chief Carson rightfully complained, if a community has only two or three police officers, that mandate ties up a substantial portion of the force for a time with little benefit, harming the entire com-community. As a result, “you begin to find officers ignoring juvenile crime, as they often can, until it becomes a most serious matter.”
Once again, the Committee finds this to be the opposite of how the juvenile justice system should function. As Chief Carson said, “By eliminating even short-term secure detention, you have to remove the early intervention catalyst that brought together the forces that could provide earlier identification and assistance.” Due to this mandate, juveniles learn what they can get away with without consequence. As Chief Carson stated, “In many cases when responding to [a] call involving a juvenile, the offender will quote to the officer exactly what the officer can and cannot do, along with saying, ‘You can’t lock me up’ and ‘All I’ll get is probation.’” Wisconsin’s Ray Luick believes that detention should be permissible in rural areas for up to 72 hours, which is not a major change from current law if the weekend and holiday exception is considered. Detention space that would satisfy OJJDP simply is not often available in rural areas. Oklahoma’s Jerry Regier testified that some judges waive property offenders to adult court (in which case the mandate does not apply) because there is no detention space available, which results in a cure worse than the disease. Youths are transported long distances in many instances under the current law, only to then be returned a few days later. Virginia’s Patricia West told the Subcommittee that the jail removal mandate in rural areas means that the youth, if detained, is confined outside the community. Given the hassles, many departments choose not to arrest juveniles, which sends the wrong message. Mr. Luick testified that Wisconsin has both a high juvenile arrest rate and a low juvenile crime rate. The Committee believes that this is not a coincidence. Chief Carson testified that a 72-hour exception to the jail removal mandate would make police more willing to “make the arrest, make the citation, and get the system started for the juvenile now before it gets too serious.” The Committee wishes to change the law so that States will not face incentives not to arrest.

The Committee also heard testimony that the separation mandate should be changed. Clearly, the Committee agrees with Colorado’s William Woodward that having adults in close proximity to youth can increase the risk of violence to juveniles, the risk of suicide, and potential liability to law enforcement officials, as well as exposing juveniles to a dangerously influential criminal element. Nonetheless, Sheriff Oedekoven testified that under OJJDP regulations, this mandate prohibits even haphazard contacts between adults and juveniles. Separate staff must be maintained, so that “an officer stationed in a guard tower cannot flip a switch to open a cell block door for an adult inmate during the same shift in which he opened a door for a juvenile.” He stated that “Congress should re-examine the role of the OJJDP and reign [sic] in their rule-making authority.” Virginia’s Patricia West testified how difficult it is to avoid even haphazard contact, and stated that the most serious harm likely occurs only if juveniles are actually housed with adult offenders.

OJJDP also ordinarily interprets the sight and sound separation mandate to preclude collocated facilities. Wisconsin’s Ray Luick testified that such facilities permit the shared use of educational and recreational facilities that otherwise would not be available to juveniles, and he recommended that the JJDPA be modified to permit shared staff and collocated facilities.

The Subcommittee also heard testimony that the disproportionate minority confinement mandate should be changed. Utah’s Camille Anthony stated that this mandate “is inappropriately placed on the juvenile justice system.” She believes that “states cannot comply with it in its present form.” Oklahoma’s Jerry Regier testified that youths are arrested for their acts, rather than their race. He suggested that the answer to the problem of disproportionate minority confinement is “to ensure prevention monies get to the right neighborhoods and families so we can actually reduce the percentage of African-Americans coming into the system.”
Such an approach is consistent with the ABA’s Robert Schwartz, who states that under this mandate in Pennsylvania, “state and local partnerships have used formula grants to introduce intensive prevention programs in high-crime areas with large minority populations.”

Under current law, States are penalized for noncompliance with the mandates. Judge Turner testified that OJJDP should not penalize States with a loss of 25 percent of their funding for each mandate not complied with. And Virginia’s Patricia West stated that this penalty, combined with the requirement that the remainder of the formula grant allocation be used to comply with any mandate a state does not satisfy is “unnecessarily punitive.” She indicated that States may want to fund multiyear pilot prevention programs, and funding for these programs may be cut off in midstream, no matter how effective the program, if the State temporarily is out of compliance with a mandate. In any event, the GAO’s Laurie Ekstrand found that OJJDP conducts little monitoring for compliance with the mandates. GAO found that OJJDP conducted 29 such on-site monitoring visits in the three years 1993–95, rather than the 171 that would have been conducted if OJJDP had adhered to its policy of annual visits for each State.

Finally, States are currently required as a condition of receiving JJDPA funds to set up a State Advisory Group, and the statute prescribes many conditions a State must satisfy in setting up the advisory group. In addition, the State must spend a certain portion of its JJDPA allocation on the advisory group. Utah’s Camille Anthony testified that these requirements were burdensome. She believes that many States receive little of value from these advisory groups. She also found that some of the membership requirements were impractical, such as including young people who may be in school and have difficulty in obtaining transportation to the meetings. In lieu of State advisory groups, she suggested that Congress “allow States to determine the appropriate mechanism by which these funds should be distributed and the board that makes that decision.”

E. RESEARCH, EVALUATION, AND DISSEMINATION

OJJDP was established in large part to be the Federal Government’s research arm into juvenile delinquency and to be a resource to States on effective programs and techniques to address the problem. This meant that OJJDP would undertake its own research and evaluation efforts but that it would also disseminate to the States the results of well-considered evaluation and research studies performed by others. Given the juvenile delinquency problem of the time, Congress was farsighted in the creation of this function. Unfortunately, the Committee believes that OJJDP has failed to fulfill the promise of determining effective programs. Indeed, the Committee believes that we know little more of what is effective today than we knew two decades ago, putting to one side how to address the very different youth violence problem that exists today. At the Subcommittee’s oversight hearing, for instance, witnesses were able to identify only a few OJJDP-funded programs that had been evaluated to be effective. This was true notwithstanding OJJDP’s publication of a list of programs purported to be effective, only a small number of which had ever been evaluated.

The Committee believes that it is an urgent priority that the research and evaluation mission that was intended for OJJDP 22 years ago actually be performed. Everyone knows that youth violence is a serious national problem, but little is known about successfully preventing those crimes or intervening to make young criminals turn away from their offending. Professor Blumstein testified that existing research findings “reflect only a tiny portion of what we need to know to make effective policy and operational decisions” and that we are “at an extremely primitive stage of knowledge regarding violence.” One major deficit in the existing research is its frequent focus on one site or setting, rather than a determination of whether a particular approach can be generalized to a larger population base, he indicated. Professor Blumstein told the Subcommittee that while some work has been done to determine the effectiveness of intervention programs, little research into effective prevention is available because of the lengthy time periods required to measure the effectiveness of prevention programs.

Numerous witnesses concurred that the primary responsibility for the operation and effectiveness of the juvenile justice system lies with State and local governments. Nonetheless, a consensus among witnesses developed that conducting research and evaluation of programs designed to combat youth violence is a proper Federal function. Professor Blumstein concluded that States are unlikely to focus on such a public good when its benefits would be dispersed so widely. Even if States did conduct such research, the results would not reflect the effectiveness of a program upon a broad range of populations, which is a critical research need. Further, only the Federal Government is likely to conduct such comprehensive research due to its cost, although economies of scale would be available at the Federal level.

To be sure, OJJDP currently conducts research, and some of the witnesses praised some of its research. Nonetheless, OJJDP emphasizes how much of its resources are returned directly to the States, implicitly recognizing that little of its budget is directed to research and evaluation. And the quality of much of its research work is subject to criticism. Dean Schwartz, a former OJJDP Administrator, remarked that “OJJDP still does not have a focus and coherent research and development agenda. Because of this, resources have been squandered and little knowledge has been advanced in key areas.”

Witnesses agreed not only that the quality of Federal research must be improved, but that the budget for such research must be increased as well. Professor Blumstein contrasted the OJJDP youth violence research budget of under $20 million with NIH’s budget, which is nearly 1000 times larger. “It is clear that the research expenditures in this area are profoundly inconsistent with the magnitude of the problem, with the resources being expended to address the problem, and with the resources committed to other comparably important National issues.”

Witnesses appearing before the Subcommittee raised urgent and serious issues in youth violence in research that would be appropriate subjects for Federal research efforts. Professor Blumstein discussed the paucity of information concerning the development of violent career criminals and how that development relates to family environments. Dean Schwartz agreed that little is known concerning the prevention of serious chronic and violent behavior. Professor Blumstein also listed as necessary research issues the effect of community conditions such as social isolation on juvenile violence, gang violence, drug markets, and gun markets. Additionally, research is needed into what intervention programs successfully socialize offenders, and how the juvenile justice system can control illegal guns and drugs. Dean Schwartz finds that research is needed into the effectiveness of applying adult sentencing practices on juveniles and in identifying effective programs, with reference to particular types of youth in particular circumstances. He also thinks the relationship of substance abuse to youth crime needs further study.

In addition to directing research into basic questions such as criminal history progression and the effects of trying youths as adults, witnesses such as Professors Thornberry and Elliott agreed that rigorous evaluation research should be conducted on various prevention programs to determine if such programs are effective. Professor Elliott believes that too much of what OJJDP spends on evaluation does not actually determine the effectiveness of programs, but only whether a program delivers the services that it said in its grant application that it would provide. The GAO’s Laurie Ekstrand found that the evaluations OJJDP conducted for its discretionary grants were of exactly that process-oriented character. Too often, recipients of Federal prevention grants make well-meaning but unsubstantiated claims that their programs are successful. The Committee agrees with Professor Wolfgang that self-congratulatory anecdotal claims of success should be discounted.

Peer-reviewed evaluations are the only means of determining which prevention programs actually are worth funding. To study effectiveness, individual programs need to be tested in different locations with different youths and different staffs for a lengthy time period. Such evaluation is expensive. Professor Elliott told the Subcommittee that “the evaluations we are talking about here cost as much as the annual budget for most of these programs.” Yet, less comprehensive evaluations will produce little new knowledge of successful approaches to reduce what is perhaps the country’s most significant problem.

Witnesses such as Professors Thornberry and Elliott agreed that if JJDPA were turned into a block grant program, no such comprehensive evaluations would occur. States would spend the money without having any base of knowledge whether the money was spent on effective programs. They thought that scenario should be avoided.

Of course, not all research will produce evidence of successful approaches. However, as Professor Thornberry noted, identifying programs that do not work is as important as identifying successful programs. Indeed, some research in this area has identified programs that are not only not effective, but are actually harmful. States need to know which programs their formula grants should not support.
To do so, Dean Schwartz and Professor Wolfgang maintain that OJJDP needs to do a better job in disseminating to the States the result of research and evaluation efforts. Dean Schwartz mentioned that OJJDP should provide the States with more policy-relevant information, such as the studies that suggest that juveniles who go to adult prison are more likely to commit crimes upon their release than similarly situated juveniles who are sent to juvenile facilities. Once effective programs are identified, Professors Elliott and Wolfgang suggested that States be given incentives to implement successful programs and not to fund unsuccessful ones.

Professors Blumstein and Elliott also stressed the importance of the Federal Government’s provision of training and technical assistance to the States, once it has been determined that there are effective techniques and evaluations that have been carried out. Professor Elliott mentioned that OJJDP now has 8 grants for data collection, and funds 24 agencies for technical assistance, which should be better coordinated.

The call at the hearings for additional research was not made by academics alone. Colonel Gordon indicated that no one knows whether various programs are effective, and thought that “the best thing the Federal Government could do is provide research for that effort.” Judge Deacon described the Federal Government’s providing of research and training as “one of the real critical needs.” A Tennessee youth detention center administrator agreed. And Utah’s Camille Anthony indicated that if JJDPA is to be reauthorized, OJJDP “should concentrate on assisting States with the development of effective prevention programs.”

F. DISCRETIONARY GRANTS

In addition to providing formula grants, enforcing the mandates, conducting research, and providing technical assistance and disseminating information to the States, OJJDP currently administers discretionary grants. The Committee believes that these discretionary grants are in need of major restructuring. It agrees with Tennessee’s Barbara Holden that too much Federal antidelinquency spending results from “design[ing] programs and t[ying] government dollars to problems which are the most pressing at that time. It seems to make little difference that these programs repeatedly fail to make the gains that we hope to accomplish through them.”

Because OJJDP’s research and evaluation efforts have been unsatisfactory over the years, OJJDP today funds tens of millions of dollars of discretionary grants without any assurance that those funds will reduce youth violence. Current law makes States agree to fund federally designed projects in order to qualify for Federal funds, whether these projects are the State’s primary youth violence problem or whether the program will make a positive difference. The Committee firmly believes that the Federal Government, including the Congress, needs to cease its current mindset that simply creating and funding a Federal youth violence program equates with ameliorating the problem.

Too much of OJJDP’s current practices involve funding and administering without regard to whether its actions lead to effective punishment or prevention. Not only does its myopic interpretation of the mandates cause unnecessary expense for States without results, but too many of its discretionary grants are designed to further extend the reach of the mandates seemingly for their own sake. Dean Schwartz encouraged the Congress to turn JJDPA’s attention away from the mandates and use OJJDP’s discretionary funds for more pressing juvenile crime control and prevention issues.

Even more serious, too much of OJJDP’s discretionary grants are used for programs that are not known to be effective, and that may even be detrimental. For instance, JJDPA funds a discretionary grant program for mentoring. Yet, according to Professor Wolfgang, “the majority of these mentoring programs do not work.” Professor DiIulio is on the board of Public-Private Ventures, which conducted a study showing the effectiveness of the Big Brother/Big Sisters program. However, that evaluation focused on the specific differences in that program that distinguished it from other mentoring programs. In fact, the Committee is aware of evaluations of certain mentoring programs that increased juvenile crime by exposing youth to mentors who were negative influences, compared with a control group.

Similarly, OJJDP administers a discretionary grant program under JJDPA that supposedly combats gang activity. Professor Wolfgang has studied the evaluation literature of gang education programs designed to prevent young people from joining gangs, as well as other programs designed to work with existing gang members. He told the Subcommittee that evaluations of gang education programs showed only that they had changed attitudes, but that programs like Gang Resistance and Education Training [GREAT] “had virtually zero impact” in actually reducing gang membership. Programs that worked with gang members did not reduce gang membership or gang-related crime. In certain instances, he related, “negative effects such as increased delinquency were observed.” Professor Elliott noted that the Government is funding ineffective programs and “[i]t doesn’t seem to bother us. We have got very popular programs going on right now * * * that we have at least fairly good evidence aren’t working that we are still spending money on.” The Committee strongly concludes that JJDPA and OJJDP should not fund programs labelled as “anti-gang”, or “mentoring” programs that at best are a waste of money and at worst actually increase delinquency.

The problem is growing. GAO found that OJJDP has funded 162 new discretionary grants in recent years. Without knowing the effectiveness of these programs, it seems that OJJDP’s current uses of discretionary funds to treat juvenile delinquency can be compared to the use of bleeding to treat disease two centuries ago.

The Committee believes that this is the greatest current problem in Federal crime prevention funding. A recent GAO report found that the Government funds 131 programs designed to prevent youth crime at a cost of $4 billion. GAO found that substantial duplication may exist in the types of programs and the target population. So many programs exist that even top OJJDP staff, the agency that by statute is supposed to coordinate the Federal Government’s delinquency prevention effort, understandably did not know of the existence of some of the programs. Moreover, these programs have been designed and funded with strict Federal rules that are not required to guarantee effectiveness, but because someone arbitrarily decided they should exist. In addition, Professors Elliott and Wolfgang told the Subcommittee that many of these 131 Federal antidelinquency programs are “involved in things that we have got pretty good evidence aren’t effective.”

Fixing this overall problem is beyond the scope of reauthorizing the JJDPA. Nonetheless, the Committee believes that the Federal Government has made a serious mistake in its juvenile crime policy. It has mandated that States spend money for particular programs without having any idea whether these programs are effective. In the next Congress, committees with oversight jurisdiction should examine whether federally funded antidelinquency programs are duplicative and effective. The Committee believes that it is appropriate for Federal resources to fund effective crime prevention, not necessarily any social spending labelled as such. Because of the lack of knowledge and the Federal Government’s poor track record in this area, the Committee hesitates to spell out specific crime prevention programs for States to implement or specific crime prevention programs that should receive funding from discretionary grants.

The Committee found that OJJDP’s discretionary grants are used in other ways that are unrelated to effective crime prevention. For instance, Dean Schwartz explained, too much of OJJDP’s discretionary funds are tied up in earmarks and set-asides to organizations that, while worthy and important, were not intended to be the beneficiary of OJJDP’s limited discretionary funds. Congress has written into the statute an earmark for the National Council of Juvenile and Family Court Judges, for instance. As Dean Schwartz told the Subcommittee and Professor Elliott concurred, “If just $20 million of the $40 million that went to the National Council of Juvenile and Family Court Judges might have been targeted for critical research trying to address the prevention issue for chronic delinquents or preventing serious violent behavior, we might not be in this position that we are in today. You can make a very good argument that judicial training ought to be a state and local responsibility. * * *”

Moreover, he suggests that discretionary grants be freed up, and the money used to fund a set of prioritized national issues in research in the field. He also advocates that the discretionary funds be awarded competitively. The Committee agrees.

A further problem concerning OJJDP’s discretionary grants brought to the Committee’s attention is their direction to programs that are not innovative. Professor Elliott remarked that the creative programs in this area that have been funded over the past 10 years have not come out of OJJDP. In fact, a number of academicians have told the Subcommittee that one large discretionary grant program is based on knowledge that is far from innovative and has essentially created a cottage industry for the provision of technical assistance to grant recipients.

Dean Schwartz testified, “Over the years there has been a steady decline in the stature, influence, and respect of the OJJDP. The Office is not reviewed [sic] as a credible resource to elected public officials and juvenile justice professionals. * * *” The Committee reluctantly concludes that OJJDP’s difficulties with rigidly enforcing an impractical interpretation of the mandates, its failure to conduct quality evaluation and disseminate useful information to the States, its funding of discretionary grants of dubious value, and the pressing need for more research and evaluation into effective approaches to preventing and controlling youth violence, require a restructuring of the Office.

The Committee views S. 1952 as making the changes in the re-authorization of JJDPA that were recommended by the witnesses who appeared, witnesses who reflected expertise in criminology as well as vast experience with the practical administration of existing statutory provisions. The Committee does not consider S. 1952 to be a panacea for the very serious youth violence problem now facing the country. It does, however, believe that S. 1952 establishes a useful role for the Federal Government to assist States and localities to carry out their responsibilities to prevent, prosecute, and punish youth violence.

IV. VOTE OF THE COMMITTEE

On August 1, 1996, with a quorum present, the Senate Committee on the Judiciary by voice vote ordered S. 1952 favorably reported.

V. SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE

This section sets forth the short title of the legislation, “The Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act of 1996.”

SECTION 101. FINDINGS

This section rewrites the findings of the current legislation. Youth violence figures are updated. The findings reflect that younger persons are committing violent acts and that if current trends continue, given the increase in the youth population over the next several years, youth violence will dramatically increase unless effective prevention and control strategies are adopted. This section also finds that illegitimacy, the decline of marriage, welfare dependence, and youth violence are closely interrelated, as are child abuse and neglect and youth violence. Further, the section adds findings that increased drug abuse has led to increases in child abuse and youth violence, and that child welfare agencies fail to break the cycle between abuse and delinquency. Additionally, this section finds that the juvenile justice system fails to protect the public from violent youths, particularly because it fails to impose certain and graduated punishments. This section also finds that existing Federal programs have not provided the research and evaluation necessary to determine which programs are effective in preventing youth violence. Further, the section finds that current mandates in the legislation have been administered too inflexibly, and have made the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency prevention too focused on issues unrelated to preventing or punishing youth violence. This section eliminates findings in current law concerning services to juveniles, Federal leadership, rehabilitation, and public recreation and self-esteem.

SECTION 102. PURPOSES

This section adds new purposes to the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act. The section adds that scientific evaluation into effective means of preventing youth violence is now a purpose of the legislation, as is assisting the States in punishing and controlling youth offenders. Purposes in existing law to develop national standards, strengthening families, and removing youths from local jails are eliminated.

SECTION 103. JUVENILE JUSTICE AND DELINQUENCY PREVENTION ACT

This section makes changes to title II of the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act. This section amends section 201 of JJDPA by changing the name of the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention to the Office of Youth Violence Reduction. The Administrator of the office would no longer be a Presidential appointee, but rather a career appointee who has experience in juvenile justice programs. The Administrator has the authority to prescribe regulations consistent with the Act to award, administer, modify, extend, terminate, monitor, evaluate, reject, or deny all grants and contracts from, and applications for, funds made available under this title.

This section also amends section 204 of JJDPA to require the Administrator to submit his plan for Federal juvenile delinquency prevention programs to the Congress, rather than the current requirement of consulting with the Coordinating Council of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention. In addition, the Administrator is given the role of reducing duplication among Federal juvenile delinquency programs and activities conducted by Federal departments and agencies. In submitting his plan to the Congress, the Administrator should inform Congress which Federal programs appear duplicative, and which programs appear to be ineffective based on evaluations conducted by the Federal Government or nonprofit entities. Most of the Administrator's current responsibilities set forth in section 204 are eliminated.

This section strikes section 206, the Coordinating Council on Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention. The Committee believes that the Council meets infrequently, despite prior congressional attempts to increase its activity. The Committee also believes that the Council does not effectively coordinate Federal antidelinquency programs, as evidenced by a recent report of the U.S. General Accounting Office.

This section also strikes portions of current section 207 of JJDPA, now redesignated section 206, that refer to the Council. It also eliminates the requirement that the Administrator report on State compliance with State plans under JJDPA. Additionally, the section requires the Administrator to report on scientifically evaluated and demonstrated effective delinquency prevention programs. The Committee finds that the current law's requirement that the Administrator identify "exemplary" prevention programs serves no useful purpose if those programs have not been scientifically determined to be effective.
This section amends section 221 of JJDPA by eliminating the Administrator's authority to evaluate programs and to issue grants to implement State plans. Evaluation functions under JJDPA will now be under the exclusive domain of the National Institute for Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention. This section also eliminates the requirement in section 221 of JJDPA that recipients of technical assistance coordinate their activities with State advisory groups.

This section amends section 222 of JJDPA by eliminating references to parts D and E of JJDPA. Additionally, references to earlier fiscal years are changed to authorize appropriations for the next 4 fiscal years. Further, the section removes the requirement in section 222(d) of JJDPA that 5 percent of the minimum annual allocation to any State be made available to assist the State advisory group.

This section substitutes new language for section 223 of JJDPA. States would no longer be required to submit 3-year State plans to the Administrator and demonstrate progress in implementing those plans. States would also no longer be required to establish State advisory groups. States would be permitted to establish State advisory groups, and if they choose to do so, may choose to adhere to all, some, or none of the requirements for those groups now contained in section 223 of JJDPA. This section also eliminates the current requirements in section 223 of JJDPA that State plans contain various analyses, distribute funds in various ways, provide for certain rights protections, and establish various other plans.

This section provides that for States to be eligible to receive formula grants, they must spend at least 75 percent of the formula grants for preventive and nonincarcerative intervention, including drug and alcohol treatment activities, and programs that encourage courts to develop and implement a continuum of post-adjudication restraints that bridge the gap between probation and confinement in a correctional facility, including graduated sanctions for youth offenders, and for implementing a system whereby every offender receives some sanction for every crime, except that such funds cannot be used for purposes that the National Institute for Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention determines do not prevent or reduce youth violence. To comply with this requirement, States may spend funds to become able to impose various graduated sanctions, but that term does not include correctional facilities, although States may use the other 25 percent of the formula grants for these purposes. Present law imposes a 75-percent requirement for spending on a narrower range of program options. Since the imposition of punishment in additional cases may constitutionally require that more youth receive access to counsel, States may use funds for graduated sanctions for this purpose. This section permits States to use funds for any preventive purpose that NIJJDP determines not to be ineffective. For this reason, this section eliminates the long list of activities that under current law satisfy this requirement of section 223, since many of these may not be effective in preventing youth violence or imposing graduated punishments or some sanction for every crime.

This section also requires that States provide for the keeping of records by recipients of formula grants so that NIJJDP can monitor whether the use of the funds has prevented or reduced youth violence.

This section requires that States, as a condition for receipt of formula grants, ensure that juveniles who are charged with or who have committed offenses that would not be criminal if committed by an adult (other than an offense that constitutes a violation of a valid court order or a violation of section 922(x) of title 18, United States Code, or a similar State law), or alien juveniles in custody, or such nonoffenders as dependent or neglected children, shall not be placed in secure detention or secure correctional facilities, except that the juvenile or family court may detain, after a hearing, in a secure detention facility for a limited time not to exceed 72 hours, a runaway, truant, or incorrigible youth, if the youth either (1) received a previous official court warning that an additional instance of such behavior would result in the secure detention of that youth or (2) the chronic behavior of the youth constitutes a clear and present danger to the physical or emotional well-being of the youth or the physical safety of the community, if the juvenile’s detention is not longer than the time necessary to eliminate such danger and secure detention is the least restrictive means available for guarding the safety of the youth or the community. Under existing section 223 of JJDPA, status offenders as a practical matter cannot be securely detained. This section would allow, but would not mandate, that States could securely detain chronic status offenders for up to 72 hours if they had received a prior judicial warning that such result would follow continued commission of status offenses. States are encouraged to provide assistance to such youth during this period. In addition, States could, but would not be forced to, securely detain status offenders whose chronic behavior poses a threat to their own safety or public safety, as might be the case for chronic runaways who are found at late hours living on the street.

This section also establishes a condition for State receipt of formula grants that an annual report be submitted to the Administrator describing compliance with section 223 of JJDPA and containing a review of the progress in deinstitutionalizing status offenders under the revised section 223. This is necessary so that the Administrator can determine if the State is complying with the statutory conditions for receipt of formula grants.

This section amends the separation mandate by prohibiting only the regular contact of adults and juveniles. This section amends the requirement that direct-care and management staff cannot be shared to permit such sharing if the staff has been properly trained and certified by the State to deal with juvenile offenders, and staff is not dealing directly with both adult and juvenile prisoners in the same shift. “Regular contact” means that youth may not be in sight or sound contact with adults when in residential confinement, but that incidental contact in common areas is permissible if reasonable efforts, such as curtains and blackened windows, are used to separate adult and juvenile offenders, including in spaces for processing accused offenders. This section also permits the use of collocated facilities if such steps are taken. Staff that has no role in direct care or management of youth offenders, such as cooks, may be shared in the same shift. In addition, direct-care and management staff may be shared between youths and adults so long as the State has provided training and certification on dealing with juvenile offenders, and such staff does not deal directly with both adults and juveniles in the same shift. No specific form of good-faith training and certification is required.

This section amends the jail removal mandate of section 223 of JJDPA. States could receive formula grants while permitting the detention or confinement of juveniles in a State-approved operation of a county jail or secure detention facility for up to 72 hours if there is compliance with the separation mandate as revised and the facility is located outside a metropolitan area where no existing acceptable alternative placement is easily accessible, rather than the current standard of “availability.” This section eliminates exceptions to the current jail removal standard that are no longer necessary as a result of the amended language.

This section amends the disproportionate minority confinement mandate contained in section 223 of JJDPA. The new standard requires only that States address prevention efforts to reduce the proportion of minority group members who are securely detained if such proportion exceeds the group’s proportion in the general population, and that they adhere to the requirement codified at section 3789d(b) of 42 U.S.C. This change addresses the concern that the existing language of this mandate, reasonably can be read to have unintentionally required that quotas be imposed on the locking up of individuals based on their race rather than their conduct. To comply with the new language, States would have to ensure that at least some of their prevention money was spent in areas where minority groups were concentrated if those groups were being securely detained in proportions greater than their proportion of the general population. Supporters of the current language of this mandate testified that that was their understanding of existing law.

This section changes the penalty provisions of existing section 223 for failing to comply with various mandates. If a State fails to comply with any one of the following mandates: status offenders, separation, jail removal, or minority overrepresentation, the Administrator shall reduce the State’s formula grant allocation by 25 percent. States could continue to spend the remainder of their formula grant on the purposes permitted under section 223, and would not need to use those funds to come into compliance with that mandate. If a State failed to comply with more than one of those four mandates, then it would lose 50 percent of its formula grant funding, and could use the remaining 50 percent for the crime prevention activities permitted under section 223. States could thus receive 50 percent of their formula grant amounts even if they complied with none of these four mandates. This section prohibits the imposition of penalties on States that fail to comply with the mandates of section 223 if those States have enacted legislation conforming to those requirements that contains enforcement mechanisms sufficient to ensure that such legislation is enforced effectively. OJJDP can determine whether there is effective enforcement either because the State law in fact results in near total compliance with the mandates or because available administrative or judicial remedies effectively enforce State laws that adopt the same standards as contained in section 223.
This section also amends section 241 of JJDPA to move the National Institute of Juvenile Justice out of the Office of Youth Violence Reduction and into the Office of Justice Programs. The head of NIJJDP will be denominated the Director of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, a position that shall be filled through Presidential appointment with the advice and consent of the Senate from among individuals who have had experience in juvenile justice programs or experience in scientific research. The required experience in scientific research need not be in the field of juvenile justice. This section adds as purposes of NIJJDP to provide for the rigorous and independent evaluation of the delinquency and youth violence prevention programs funded by the formula grants and to provide funding for research and demonstration projects on the nature, causes, and prevention of youth violence and juvenile delinquency. The purpose of these changes is to make sure that the programs formulated under the formula grants can be scientifically and independently evaluated to determine their effectiveness. The statute does not provide sufficient funds to result in the evaluation of all formula grant funded programs, but the Director should evaluate a mix of programs in a variety of locales among a diverse group of youth so that knowledge can be gained about the evaluation of types of programs as well as individual approaches. This section removes the Director's role with the State advisory groups, including the provision of technical assistance. This section also directs NIJJDP to make grants and enter into contacts to evaluate programs funded by State formula grants as well as to evaluate the projects it funds itself, and to fund research projects. This section requires that these evaluations and research studies be independent, awarded competitively, and employ rigorous and scientifically recognized standards and methodologies, including peer review by nonapplicants. The Committee's desire is to enhance the professionalism and quality of work product conducted by NIJJDP, with NIH, NSF, and similar Federal research agencies as models.

This section amends section 243 of JJDPA by eliminating references to programs that strengthen and preserve families, due to the questionable nature of such programs as a matter of policy and effectiveness. This section also directs that the technical assistance provided by NIJJDP be of the best practices, instead of simply providing technical assistance as under current section 244 of JJDPA. Rather than encouraging the development of programs to take into account life experiences of offenders, this section directs NIJJDP to develop, through research and evaluation, studies concerning effective methods for preventing and intervening in juvenile delinquency, including studies of the effectiveness of waiving juveniles into adult court and risk prediction, with particular reference to the circumstances of the youth and staff involved that make a particular program successful or unsuccessful. Further issues for research by NIJJDP are identified in the discussion portion of this report and through section 301 of the legislation. This section also directs NIJJDP to disseminate the results of what NIJJDP learns about effective programs and research into youth crime and other data collection. NIJJDP is also to disseminate regular reports on the record of each State in combatting youth violence, such as the number, rate, and trend of homicides and other serious crimes committed by youths. In this way, States can be held accountable for whether they are using crime prevention funds wisely, and States can learn which States are operating programs that might be effective for use in their own States. Provisions in this section concerning NIJJDP’s authority to undertake studies into subjects covered by the mandates in section 223 of JJDPA are eliminated.

This section strikes section 244 of JJDPA concerning technical assistance, section 245 on training programs, 246 on curriculum for training programs, 247 relating to participating in training programs and State advisory group conferences, and 248 on special studies and reports. NIJJDP is authorized instead to provide the best practices for technical assistance, primarily by informing States of what methods and programs have been scientifically demonstrated to be effective.

This section also strikes section 261 of JJDPA, special emphasis prevention and treatment programs. The programs currently listed in this section either concern the mandates and are thus unrelated to punishing or preventing youth violence, can be funded by State formula grants if States so choose, or have not been demonstrated to be effective in preventing youth violence.

This section also redesignates present section 262 of JJDPA as section 244, and adds factors the Director must consider in determining whether or not to approve applications for grants and contracts for research and evaluation that are designed to improve the scientific validity of the research conducted. These include whether the project uses appropriate and rigorous methodology, including appropriate samples, control groups, psychometrically sound measurement, and appropriate data analysis techniques, the experience of the principal and coprincipal investigators in the area of youth violence and juvenile delinquency, the protection offered human subjects in the study, including informed consent procedures, and the cost effectiveness of the proposed project. Quality of the research is further enhanced by this section’s requirement that NIJJDP select grant and contract recipients only after a competitive process that provides potential applicants with at least 90 days to submit applications for funds, after the applications are subject to formal peer review by qualified scientists with expertise in the fields of criminology, juvenile delinquency, sociology, psychology, research methodology, evaluation research, statistics and related areas. The peer review process is to conform to the process used by NIH, NIJ, or NSF.

This section strikes Part D of title II of JJDPA, concerning Gang-Free Schools and Communities and Community-Based Gang Intervention. Leading criminologists have determined that programs such as these have not been found to be effective, and in some cases may cause delinquency, as mentioned in the discussion section of this report, so the Committee has determined that they should not be funded. These grants may also not be relevant to many States as a priority, and force States to adhere to particular requirements that may not be effective or useful to particular States’ problems as well.

This section strikes part E of title II of JJDPA, concerning State Challenge Activities. This part currently provides States an additional 10 percent of their formula grant award for conducting challenge activities the State chooses to engage in. Many of these grant activities are unrelated to preventing or punishing youth violence, such as, but not limited to, the mandates in section 223, and the prevention programs have not been determined to be effective. States may choose to fund the prevention programs out of their formula grants if they believe them to be worthy.

This section also eliminates part F of title II of JJDPA, treatment for juvenile offenders who are victims of child abuse and neglect. This part has never been funded, and the Committee believes that the Victims of Child Abuse Act that is reauthorized by this legislation is effective in removing abused children from abusive and criminogenic family settings.

This section also eliminates part G of title II of JJDPA, mentoring. As noted above, expert criminologists have concluded that most mentoring programs are ineffective, and some may even foster delinquency. States may use their formula grants to fund mentoring programs of the type that have not been found to be ineffective. For the same reason, this section eliminates part H, boot camps. This section also eliminates authorization for the White House Conference on Juvenile Justice, which was contained in part I of title II of JJDPA.

This section also authorizes funding of $160 million for JJDPA for fiscal years 1997, 1998, 1999, and 2000, of which $70 million is to be expended for State formula grants, $70 million is to be made available to NIJJDJP (of which not less than $28 million shall be made available for evaluation research of prevention programs, and $16 million is made available for child protection, of which $7 million is to be made available for title IV of JJDPA). Not more than $4,000,000 shall be expended for administrative costs. Dean Schwartz testified that OJJDP has 70 staff, which he considers excessive, and which he recommended could be cut substantially.

This section amends section 299 of JJDPA to limit the regulatory authority of what is currently called OJJDP. Under this section, the Office of Youth Violence Reduction will no longer have the authority to promulgate regulations under the status offender, separation, jail removal, and minority overrepresentation mandates of JJDPA. This has been done because the Committee believes that OJJDP has used its regulatory authority in this area to impose burdens on States based on readings of the statutory language that were never intended to be adopted. Accordingly, current OJJDP regulations concerning the language of statutory mandates, all of which have been changed by this legislation, would be null and void. Given OJJDP’s prior reading of the current language of the mandates, courts interpreting the language of these four statutory mandates should accord no deference to the interpretation of the Office of Youth Violence Reduction within the rule of Chevron U.S.A. Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, 467 U.S. 837 (1984).

SECTION 103. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR RUNAWAY AND HOMELESS YOUTH ACT

This section reauthorizes the Runaway and Homeless Youth Act at its current level of funding for fiscal year 1997, and for such sums as may be necessary for fiscal years 1998, 1999, and 2000.
This section repeals the special study and report contained in section 409 of the JJDPA. This section also repeals title V of JJDPA. There is no evidence that some of the seven purposes for which these grants are effective in preventing or punishing youth violence. In addition, title V requires localities which obtain these grants to adhere to the mandates of section 223 of the Act, mandates unrelated to punishing or preventing youth violence. This is an example of a program that has led OJJDP to focus on the mandates at the expense of finding out how to stop the skyrocketing rates of youth violence around the Nation. The Committee is also concerned that the research in the program funded by title V is not innovative, and therefore should not take up such a large proportion of OJJDP’s discretionary grant dollars, and has concerns about the means by which technical assistance is provided under this program. It believes these funds could be better used for researching and evaluating issues and programs in preventing and punishing youth violence, as well as in providing technical assistance and data collection.

SECTION 201. ANTI-DRUG ABUSE ACT OF 1988

This section repeals subtitles B and C of title III of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988. These subtitles authorized programs for drug abuse education and prevention programs relating to youth gangs and runaway youth and provided definitions for terms used therein. These programs have not been demonstrated to be effective. This section also eliminates section 7295 of the Act, which required an evaluation of certain issues by the Comptroller General in 1989.

SECTION 202. VICTIMS OF CHILD ABUSE ACT OF 1990

This section reauthorizes the Victims of Child Abuse Act of 1990 through fiscal year 2000. This section eliminates the language contained in section 223(a) that refers to national organizations because testimony received by the Committee suggests that this is an inappropriate earmark. However, the entity that is the subject of the existing earmark is eligible to compete on a level playing field with other applicants for NIJJDP research and evaluation grants and contracts. This section requires NIJJDP to make grant and contract awards under the Victims of Child Abuse Act in accord with the scientific standards established in sections 244, 299B, and 299E of title II of JJDPA.

SECTION 301. STUDY AND REPORT BY THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES

This section requires the Attorney General to enter into a contract with the National Academy of Sciences concerning the efficacy of the mandates relating to status offenders, separation, jail removal, and minority overrepresentation in reducing juvenile crime and violence, and in the safety of children in the juvenile justice system. The study shall also examine the status of research into youth violence, issues and topics in youth violence that merit further research, methodological approaches to evaluate the effectiveness of youth violence prevention efforts, the efficacy of Federal and State efforts to control youth violence, and an appropriate agenda and budget for continuing research on the problem of youth violence to be administered by the Attorney General. This section requires that within 12 months after the enactment of this legislation, the Attorney General shall submit a report to Congress describing the results of the study, and shall make this report available to the public.

SECTION 302. TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS

This section makes technical and conforming amendments to the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act.

VI. COST ESTIMATE

Hon. ORRIN G. HATCH,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The Congressional Budget Office has prepared the enclosed cost estimate for S. 1952, the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act of 1996.

Enacting S. 1952 would not affect direct spending or receipts. Therefore, pay-as-you-go procedures would not apply to the bill.

If you wish further details on this estimate, we will be pleased to provide them.

Sincerely,

JAMES L. BLUM
(For June E. O'Neill, Director).

Enclosure.

CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE—COST ESTIMATE

3. Bill status: As reported by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary on August 1, 1996.
4. Bill purpose: S. 1952 would make many changes and additions to the federal laws relating to juvenile crime and delinquency prevention programs. The bill would authorize the appropriation of:
   $160 million for each of the fiscal years 1997 through 2000 to the Department of Justice to carry out programs for controlling juvenile crimes and preventing juvenile delinquency;
   $69 million for fiscal year 1997 and such sums as may be necessary for each of the fiscal years 1998 through 2000 to the Department of Health and Human Services to make grants for runaway and homeless youth programs;
   $15 million for fiscal year 1997 and such sums as may be necessary for each of the fiscal years 1998 through 2000 to the Department of Justice to children's advocacy centers;
   $5 million for fiscal year 1997 and such sums as may be necessary for each of the fiscal years 1998 through 2000 to the Department of Justice to make grants for technical assistance and training programs relating to child abuse cases; and $600,000 for fiscal year 1997 to the Department of Justice for a study on juvenile crime.

5. Estimated cost to the Federal Government: Assuming appropriation of the authorized amounts, CBO estimates that enacting S. 1952 would result in costs to the Federal Government of about $1 billion over the 1997–2002 period. The following table summarizes the estimated budgetary effects of S. 1952, both with and without adjustments for inflation for years in which the authorized amounts are not specified.

1. The 1996 level is the amount appropriated for that year.

The costs of this bill fall within budget functions 500 and 750.

6. Basis of estimate: For the purpose of this estimate, CBO assumes that all amounts authorized by the bill for 1997 and all estimated amounts for 1998 through 2000 will be appropriated and that outlays will occur at historical rates for the authorized activities. “Such sums” authorizations were estimated by extending, both with and without adjustment for inflation, the 1967 authorization provided in the bill.

7. Pay-as-you-go considerations: None.

8. Estimated impact on state, local, and tribal governments: S. 1952 contains no intergovernmental mandates as defined in the Unfunded Mandates Reform Act of 1995 (Public Law 104–4) and would not impose costs on State, local, or tribal governments. The bill would authorize $70 million annually for fiscal year 1997 through 2000 for State juvenile justice formula grants. It would also authorize $69 million in 1997 and similar amounts from 1998 through 2000 for grants to public and private entities for runaway and homeless youth programs. S. 1952 would make a number of changes to juvenile justice grant provisions, limiting the use of certain funds and revising conditions of assistance for state and local governments. The Unfunded Mandates Reform Act of 1995 excludes such conditions of Federal assistance from the definition of an intergovernmental mandate.

The bill would remove evaluation programs and technical implementation assistance from acceptable uses of grant funds. It would also require that if less than $75 million is appropriated for juvenile justice programs, an individual State’s allocation shall be between $325,000 and $400,000, provided no other state’s allocation would fall below its 1996 level.

In order for States to qualify for Federal assistance, current law requires them to submit a three-year plan outlining details of juvenile justice programs and providing for continuing evaluation. Under S. 1952, such plans would no longer have to include the formation of an advisory group, governmental distribution guidelines, and privacy assurances. In addition, the bill would narrow the focus of programs that receive most juvenile justice funding under such plans to those dealing with community-based alternatives to incarceration, drug and alcohol treatment, juvenile court reform, and crisis intervention.

9. Estimated impact on the private sector: This bill would impose no new private-sector mandates as defined in Public Law 104–4.

10. Previous CBO estimate: None.

12. Estimate approved by: Robert A. Sunshine, for Paul N. Van de Water, Assistant Director for Budget Analysis.

VIII. REGULATORY IMPACT STATEMENT

The accordance with paragraph 11(b), rule XXVI of the Standing Rule of the Senate, the Committee, after due consideration, concludes that the act will not have significant regulatory impact.
VIII. ADDITIONAL VIEWS OF MESSRS. KENNEDY AND FEINGOLD

We commend Senator Thompson and Senator Biden for their hard work in crafting a bill to reauthorize the Juvenile Justice Act. It is clear that they have given considerable thought and attention to this vexing problem of juvenile justice.

Although the bill was favorably reported out of the committee without a rollover vote, we have a number of concerns about this measure. In its present form, we would be unable to support this measure on the Senate floor.

Most importantly, we have serious concerns about the effect of this bill on delinquency prevention and drug treatment initiatives. The elimination of categorical prevention programs under title V will likely result in the loss of a number of very important programs. For example, in Boston, the “New Generations Collaborative” is an after-school prevention program funded under title V. Under this program, at risk inner-city teens spend the after school hours in a structured setting where they learn the core values that will enable them to become productive adults. This program keeps them off the streets, and teaches them important skills. A similar program for at risk teenage girls in Montague, MA, has been equally successful at reducing teen pregnancy and juvenile delinquency.

Under this reauthorization bill, it will be much more difficult for these programs, and others across the Nation, to receive funding. Given the new focus of the bill, some States may choose to devote significant amounts of their OJJDP block grant funds for purposes other than real, primary prevention efforts. Prevention initiatives are already underfunded, as congressional appropriators have adopted a punitive approach to criminal justice. For example, congressional appropriators have refused to fund a number of prevention initiatives that were part of the 1994 crime bill. The Juvenile Justice Act is one of the only vehicles through which prevention programs are funded, and we are concerned that this source will dry up under this reauthorization proposal. Although we acknowledge the need for evaluations of existing programs, we do not understand the reasoning behind eliminating the few remaining prevention programs this Congress has chosen to fund in order to start over at square one with a research approach.

We are also concerned with the bill’s lack of a pass-through provision to ensure that funds filter down to the local level. The lack of language ensuring that Indian tribes will receive crime prevention funding is equally troubling.

Further, we are concerned that the bill repeals section 223(a)(19). This section provides important collective bargaining and job protection rights for State juvenile justice and youth services workers. It requires that grant recipients, as a condition of program eligibility, make fair and equitable arrangements for juvenile justice workers who will be employed under the terms of the grant. In particular, it guarantees workers collective bargaining rights in those States which do not have comprehensive labor relations laws for public sector employees.

The repeal of this provision would immediately jeopardize the collective bargaining rights of many thousands of juvenile justice workers. There is no evidence that this provision has posed an unreasonable burden upon States. We would be unable to support passage of a juvenile justice reauthorization bill that repeals this important worker protection provision. We look forward to working with Senators Biden and Thompson to ensure that these important worker protection provisions are retained.

We have a number of other concerns about the bill, and we look forward to working with Senator Thompson and Senator Biden to resolve them. We appreciate the efforts of Senator Thompson and Senator Biden in advancing this Congress’ debate on the critical issue of juvenile justice.

Russ Feingold.
Ted Kennedy.
IX. ADDITIONAL VIEWS OF MR. KOHL

Senator Thompson and Senator Biden should be commended for trying to accomplish what appears to be impossible: crafting a bipartisan juvenile justice bill in an election year. At a time when some have called for eliminating the Federal role in juvenile justice and others have called for merely preserving the status quo, this bill arrives at a relatively moderate position. Moreover, the proposal recognizes that times have changed since Congress wrote the Juvenile Justice Act in 1974. Back then, it was designed to protect juveniles from abusive prisons and police. This bill, however, properly recognizes that today we also need to emphasize protecting the community from violent juveniles. So there is much in this bill that we should support.

For example, it is good to see that law enforcement has been given more flexibility in dealing with the growing problem of juvenile crime. Too often in the past, we have bound police hands with redtape restrictions that did little to protect juveniles, but did much to interfere with public safety. Moreover, this bill dramatically increases funding for research and evaluation so that the Federal Government can get serious about determining which prevention programs work and which do not. And, finally, the bill helps providers of services for runaway and homeless youth continue their important work. For these reasons, I supported moving this bill out of the Judiciary Committee.

Nevertheless, some parts of this bill remain troublesome and other issues remain unaddressed. We must work to see changes in these areas before final passage.

First, at a time when the Appropriations Committee has defunded numerous crime prevention programs, this bill eliminates the few prevention programs that the Appropriations committee is willing to fund. In place of these programs, the bill offers two large block grants—one for crime prevention or graduated sanctions and the other for research/evaluation or demonstration projects. The bottom line, then, is that if a State does not want to spend money on programs that help young people before they enter the juvenile justice system it can avoid doing so whether or not these programs work. I am particularly concerned about the elimination of the Local Incentive Grants in title V. The General Accounting Office recently gave this program a positive evaluation, and it is preserved by the House version of this measure, so we ought to save it here.

The Committee Report properly points out that “[e]very witness told the Subcommittee that early intervention and prevention efforts are necessary.” The Report specifically notes that distinguished criminologists like Prof. Alfred Blumstein, Dr. John Dilulio, and Dean James Alan Fox, along with juvenile justice experts like Judge Carol Kelly and Judge Kenneth Turner, all agreed on the need for crime prevention efforts because, in the words of Professor DiIulio, “incarceration is not the answer.” Finally, the Report concludes that “early intervention” is essential because “by the time the chronic offenders are identified through their actions, the likelihood of successful intervention is low.”

Just a few pages later, however, the Report suggests that the witnesses were only able to cite “a few OJJDP-funded programs” that had been evaluated and found to be effective. In a still later section, the Report then disparages all of the prevention programs currently funded by the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, thereby justifying the bill’s elimination of these programs. Somehow, the Committee moved from agreeing with the experts that prevention was needed, to stating that only a few programs work, to disparaging—and defunding—all prevention programs in the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act.

There is no question that there is much more we need to know and Senator Cohen and I have introduced bipartisan legislation that would require that a small portion of every prevention grant go toward independent evaluation. But given the unanimous recognition that we need prevention, and that fact that some prevention programs do, in fact, work, why are we simultaneously eliminating all of the targeted prevention programs in this legislation? Do doctors suspend all AIDS treatments while the National Institute of Health continues their studies? If we recognize—as this Committee does—that some prevention programs work, why shouldn’t we fund those programs?

Second, in my opinion we ought to use this measure as a vehicle to do something about juvenile records. That does not mean that we should make all these records public, of course, but we should make sure that the records for the most violent juveniles are accessible to police and courts, can be obtained by other States, and do not magically disappear when a young criminal happens to turn 18. Moreover, if we can come up with something as a Committee, it will help us preempt less thoughtful, more punitive proposals down the road.

Finally, this bill does not deal with what many of our expert witnesses told the Youth Violence Subcommittee lay at the heart of growing youth violence: kids getting—and using—guns. While the report recognizes the conclusions of Professor Fox and Professor Blumstein that the rise in teen murders over the last decade is largely due to the proliferation of guns, the legislation does not directly address the problem at all. At the very least, a thorough juvenile justice reauthorization would restore the Gun-Free School Zones law, which the Supreme Court struck down last year in the Lopez decision.

In sum, while I commend the authors for their hard work on this measure, I remain concerned that this legislation abandons crime prevention efforts at a critical time in our Nation’s history. All of our witnesses told us that if we want to avoid staggering crime problems in the near future, we must intervene now with the 39 million American children under the age of ten. Instead of following this sensible course, S. 1952 abandons current programs in favor of years of more research. We do not have time for this wait-and-see approach: we must, as we do in all other areas of Government action, fund what works while continuing the search for more effective programs.

JUVENILE JUSTICE AND DELINQUENCY PREVENTION ACT OF 1974

(Public Law 93–415; 88 Stat. 1109)

[As Amended Through P.L. 104–18, July 7, 1995]

TITLE I—FINDINGS AND DECLARATION OF PURPOSE

FINDINGS

[Sec. 101. (a) The Congress hereby finds that—

(1) juveniles accounted for almost half the arrests for serious crimes in the United States in 1974 and for less than one-third of such arrests in 1983;

(2) recent trends show an upsurge in arrests of adolescents for murder, assault, and weapon use;

(3) the small number of youth who commit the most serious and violent offenses are becoming more violent;

(4) understaffed, overcrowded juvenile courts, prosecutorial and public defender offices, probation services, and correctional facilities and inadequately trained staff in such courts, services, and facilities are not able to provide individualized justice or effective help;

(5) present juvenile courts, foster and protective care programs, and shelter facilities are inadequate to meet the needs of children, who, because of this failure to provide effective services, may become delinquents;

(6) existing programs have not adequately responded to the particular problems of the increasing numbers of young people who are addicted to or who abuse alcohol and other drugs, particularly nonopiate or polydrug abusers;

(7) juvenile delinquency can be reduced through programs designed to keep students in elementary and secondary schools through the prevention of unwarranted and arbitrary suspensions and expulsions;

(8) State and local communities which experience directly the devastating failures of the juvenile justice system do not presently have sufficient technical expertise or adequate resources to deal comprehensively with the problems of juvenile delinquency;
existing Federal programs have not provided the direction, coordination, resources, and leadership required to meet the crisis of delinquency;

(10) the juvenile justice system should give additional attention to the problem of juveniles who commit serious crimes, with particular attention given to the areas of sentencing, providing resources necessary for informed dispositions, and rehabilitation;

(11) emphasis should be placed on preventing youth from entering the juvenile justice system to begin with; and

(12) the incidence of juvenile delinquency can be reduced through public recreation programs and activities designed to provide youth with social skills, enhance self esteem, and encourage the constructive use of discretionary time.

(b) Congress finds further that the high incidence of delinquency in the United States today results in enormous annual cost and immeasurable loss of human life, personal security, and wasted human resources and that juvenile delinquency constitutes a growing threat to the national welfare requiring immediate and comprehensive action by the Federal Government to reduce and prevent delinquency.

PURPOSE

Sec. 102. (a) It is the purpose of this Act—

(1) to provide for the thorough and ongoing evaluation of all federally assisted juvenile justice and delinquency prevention programs;

(2) to provide technical assistance to public and private nonprofit juvenile justice and delinquency prevention programs;

(3) to establish training programs for persons, including professionals, paraprofessionals, and volunteers, who work with delinquents or potential delinquents or whose work or activities relate to juvenile delinquency programs;

(4) to establish a centralized research effort on the problems of juvenile delinquency, including the dissemination of the findings of such research and all data related to juvenile delinquency;

(5) to develop and encourage the implementation of national standards for the administration of juvenile justice, including recommendations for administrative, budgetary, and legislative action at the Federal, State, and local level to facilitate the adoption of such standards;

(6) to assist State and local communities with resources to develop and implement programs to keep students in elementary and secondary schools and to prevent unwarranted and arbitrary suspensions and expulsions;

(7) to establish a Federal assistance program to deal with the problems of runaway and homeless youth;

(8) to strengthen families in which juvenile delinquency has been a problem;

(9) to assist State and local governments in removing juveniles from jails and lockups for adults;
SEC. 101. FINDINGS.

The Congress finds that—

(1) recent statistics show a 60 percent increase in murders committed by juveniles since 1884;

(2) youth who commit the most serious and violent offenses are becoming more violent, younger offenders are engaging in more violent acts, and the number of violent youth offenders has tripled since 1985;

(3) understaffed, overcrowded juvenile courts, prosecutorial and public defender offices, probation services, and correctional facilities and inadequately trained staff in such courts, services, and facilities are not able to provide individualized punishment or effective help;

(4) if recent violent crime rate trends continue, based on the projected growth of the teenage population during the next decade, youth violence will increase dramatically unless new, effective prevention and control strategies are developed and implemented;

(5) illegitimacy, the decline of marriage, welfare dependence, and youth violence are closely interrelated;

(6) there is a correlation between child abuse and neglect and delinquency and violence;

(7) child abuse has increased as the number of babies born to drug-using parents has increased, and children of these parents are at great risk of becoming violent;

(8) child welfare agencies fail to break the cycle between abuse and delinquency;

(9) State and local communities that experience directly the devastating failures of the juvenile justice system do not presently have sufficient technical expertise or adequate resources to deal comprehensively with the problems of juvenile delinquency;

(10) the juvenile justice system has failed to protect the public from violent youths, particularly because a system of certain and graduated punishment is often absent;

(11) existing programs have not adequately reduced the increasing numbers of young people who are addicted to or who abuse alcohol and other drugs;

(12) existing Federal programs have not fully provided the research and evaluation necessary to determine which programs designed to prevent youth violence are effective, nor have they led to the most effective dissemination of information regarding effective programs;

(13) prevention and intervention are more likely to be effective when directed toward younger children before they commit any offenses;

(14) mandates on States under the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act of 1974 have been administered in too inflexible a manner, and have made the Act too focused on issues unrelated to preventing or punishing youth violence;

(15) the juvenile justice system should give additional attention to the problem of juveniles who commit serious crimes and should give greater attention to halting early acts of juvenile delinquency;
(16) the high incidence of youth violence in the United States results in enormous annual cost and immeasurable loss of human life, personal security, and wasted human resources; and

(17) youth violence constitutes a growing threat to the national welfare requiring immediate and comprehensive action by the Federal Government to reduce and prevent youth violence.

SEC. 102. PURPOSES.
(a) PURPOSES.—It is the purpose of this Act—

(1) to provide for the thorough and ongoing scientific evaluation of all federally assisted juvenile justice and delinquency prevention programs and research into effective means of preventing youth violence;

(5) to assist State and local governments in improving the administration of justice and services for juveniles who enter the system;

(6) to assist States and local communities to prevent youth from becoming violent offenders; and

(7) to assist State and local governments in punishing and controlling violent youth offenders.

(b) STATEMENT OF POLICY.—It is the policy of the Congress to provide the necessary resources, leadership, and coordination—

(1) to develop and implement effective methods of preventing and reducing youth violence;

(3) to improve the quality of juvenile justice in the United States;

(4) to increase the capacity of State and local governments and public and private agencies to conduct effective juvenile justice and delinquency prevention and rehabilitation programs and to provide research, evaluation, and training services in the field of juvenile delinquency prevention;

(5) to encourage parental involvement in treatment and alternative disposition programs;

(6) to provide for coordination of services between State, local, and community-based agencies and to promote interagency cooperation in providing such services; and

(7) to impose punishments, sanctions, and control upon youth offenders.

(c)(1) Subject to paragraph (2), the Administrator shall approve any State plan and any modification thereof that meets the requirements of this section.

(2) Failure to achieve compliance with the subsection (a)(12)(A) requirement within the 3-year time limitation shall terminate any State's eligibility for funding under this part for a fiscal year beginning before January 1, 1993, unless the Administrator determines that the State is in substantial compliance with the requirement, through achievement of deinstitutionalization of not less than 75 percent of such juveniles or through removal of 100 percent of such juveniles from secure correctional facilities, and has made, through appropriate executive or legislative action, an unequivocal commitment to achieving full compliance within a reasonable time not exceeding 2 additional years.

(3) If a State fails to comply with the requirements of subsection (a), (12)(A), (13), (14), or (23) in any fiscal year beginning after January 1, 1993—

(6) provide that no juvenile shall be detained or confined in any jail or lockup for adults, except that the State may permit the detention or confinement of juveniles in a State-approved portion of a county jail or secure detention facility for up to 72 hours if such exceptions are limited to areas that are in compliance with paragraph (5), and—

(A) are outside a metropolitan statistical area; and

(B) have no existing acceptable alternative placement that is easily accessible;

(7) provide for such fiscal control and fund accounting procedures necessary to assure prudent use, proper disbursement, and accurate accounting of funds received under this title;

(B) would not replace such State, local, and other non-Federal funds; and

(9) address prevention efforts to reduce the proportion of juveniles detained or confined in secure detention facilities, jails, and lockups who are members of minority groups, if such proportion exceeds the proportion that such groups represent in the general population, and comply with the substantive requirements of section 804 of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968.

(b) PENALTIES.—If a State fails to comply with—
