CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

Expressing the need for a more comprehensive diplomatic initiative led by the United States, Republic of Iraq, and international community.

Whereas it is in the foreign policy and National security interests of the United States to foster and strengthen peace and security in Iraq and the broader Middle East region, which will require a more comprehensive international support structure including Iraq's neighboring states, other pertinent and influential countries in and outside the region, international organizations, and non-governmental organizations;

Whereas the removal of Saddam Hussein has resulted in a fundamental change in the composition and structure of Iraq's government, provincial, and tribal leadership;

Whereas the removal of Saddam Hussein has resulted in violent multi-layered conflicts of varying insurgencies, counter-insurgencies, and other armed competitions that exist today along religious, cultural, and economic lines;

Whereas the removal of Saddam Hussein has fundamentally altered the relationship between Iraq and its neighboring states thereby affecting the balance of power in the region;

Whereas elements and actions from outside Iraq's borders, including neighboring states, terrorist groups, and rogue elements continue to impede progress towards a more stable and sovereign Iraq;

Whereas Iraqis, with the unrelenting military support from the United States, have found it difficult to achieve political reconciliation and independently govern;

Whereas the Iraq Study Group stated, "a regional peace conference among Arab nations is a critically important step in helping to end the civil war in Iraq, and bringing peace and stability in the Middle East";

Whereas General Petraeus recently stated in congressional testimony "any student of history recognizes there is no military solution to a problem like that in Iraq, to the insurgency in Iraq";

Whereas finding a responsible and strategic way forward in Iraq will require international support; and

Whereas a more comprehensive international support structure must be established to engage Iraq's political, religious, ethnic, and tribal leaders in an ongoing inclusive political reconciliation and reconstruction process: Now, therefore, be it
