PROTESTS

Mr. BLUNT. Madam President, today we are on the Senate floor at a time when, once again, we are attempting as a country to reconcile things that should have been reconciled long ago. The deaths of George Floyd, Breonna Taylor, and Ahmaud Arbery shocked and outraged the country. The three of them, in a very short period of time, brought again this division we have in our country where we look at the country and particularly look at law enforcement in two different ways.

The discussion I have had with my sons is different from the discussion that many of my African-American friends have had—in fact, as far as I know, all of my African-American friends who ever talked to me about this have had—with their sons. With my sons, I would say: If you get in trouble, look for a police officer.

That is not the police officer discussion that African-American fathers often have with their sons. That discussion goes more like this: If you are picked up by the police, do exactly what you are told until I get there, and we will straighten it out once I get there.

Those are the two views of what happens.

We see in all of these cases some reason to believe that those concerns are absolute and legitimate. Because of that, there is a wide support for the protests going on around the country. At our leadership stakeout today on the Republican side, everybody was great, I think, understanding the emotion and empathy, and they talked about the importance of peaceful protests as we see these things that have happened.

The problem is we have protests peacefully during the day that turn into violence and chaos at night. The peaceful protests shouldn't become a cover for violent activity. In fact, one of my good friends who planned some protest marches told me today that there has never been a peaceful protest march planned for the nighttime. Nighttime is not the time for peaceful protest marching. It might be the time for a candlelight vigil, but not a time for peaceful protests.

What we see at night are people who either weren't part of that daytime protesting activity or were there in the daytime so they could transition to violence and looting at night. It is absolutely outrageous and absolutely unacceptable.

We saw George Floyd's brother yesterday go to the place where his brother died and say: If I am not looting, if I am not rioting, if I am not destroying other people's property, why would you be doing that?

He was saying: I lost my brother, and I am not trying to destroy my neighborhood because I lost my brother. I am not trying to destroy his neighborhood because my brother is gone.

Yet we see activities happen that are unacceptable on all fronts. Last night, in St. Louis, we had four police officers shot in the line of duty. Sometime earlier in the day, it had been anticipated that at the City Justice Center there would be a planned violent activity. You don't manage to shoot four police officers unless you are thinking about it and normally thinking about it in advance, but that is what happened. Fortunately, those wounds were all survivable.

I talked to people in the police department in St. Louis today, and they had six other events last night where police were shot at during the course of the night. We need to realize that the police officers who work and the National Guard men and women who are working are out there risking their lives trying to protect others. We need
