

Jonathan Spalter

President & CEO

Since January 2017, Jonathan Spalter has been President and CEO of USTelecom - The Broadband Association, representing technology innovators connecting families, communities and enterprises to the future. Prior to joining USTelecom, he served as founding chair of Mobile Future, the national wireless technology association. He has a long track record leading innovative technology companies and policy organizations in the U.S., Asia/Pacific, and Europe and has also held national security leadership positions in the executive branch of government.

In the private sector, Spalter's executive roles included serving as CEO of Snocap, the digital content services company founded by the creators of Napster. He also was CEO of Atmedica Worldwide, the online healthcare affiliate of the Fortune 100 telecommunications and media company Vivendi Universal, where he also served as Executive Vice President for Business Development and Strategy at its internet subsidiary VivendiNet, and as group Senior Vice President for global public policy.

In the public sector, Spalter has held a series of national security positions including at the National Security Council at the White House and at the Pentagon. He also was confirmed by the U.S. Senate as Associate Director of the United States Information Agency where he also managed the agency's global technology resources as Chief Information Officer.

Spalter has served as advisor to and board member of cutting-edge technology companies, financial institutions, and not-for-profit organizations in Silicon Valley and beyond.