

say that I am grateful for it, and again, grateful for its expression in this remarkable project which will help the people of Connecticut and the United States to understand their history.

I am delighted that this center will bear the Dodd name because it is fitting that a library, a place that keeps and honors books and records, will honor Tom Dodd's service, his passion for justice and his hatred of tyranny. Where books are preserved, studied and revered, human beings will also be treated with respect and dignity, and liberty will be strengthened.

Dedicating this research center today, we remember that when the Nazis came to power, one of the very first things they did was burn books they deemed subversive. The road to tyranny, we must never forget, begins with the destruction of the truth.

In the darkest days of the war, President Roosevelt, with those awful bonfires fresh in his memory, reflected upon how the free pursuit of knowledge protects our liberty. And he put it well when he called books "the weapons for man's freedom." I am glad that Tom Dodd will be remembered here, in this place, in this building, with this center, in the state he loved, with the very best arsenal for the freedom he fought to defend his entire life.

Thank you very much. (Applause.)

REMARKS OF SENATOR CHRISTOPHER J. DODD

Mr. President, Governor Rowland, President Hartley, colleagues distinguished guests, members of my family, friends: On behalf of my family—allow me to express my thanks to you, Mr. President, for your presence here today. You honor my father, my family, my State and our University. You are the first sitting American President to ever visit this University in the 114 year history of this institution, we are grateful.

We are grateful as well to those of you with whom my father worked over the years—his colleagues—his staff—his constituency and friends for being here to join with us in the celebration of his life of public service.

For nearly 40 years my father served his State and Nation. It was a full life—a life of engagement with the great issues of his time.

We are here to dedicate a new home for his papers and artifacts of the past. In so doing, we preserve delicate fragments of history which this and future generations should find instructive.

We are also here today to remember the achievements of those who came before us—who made and recorded the history on which our present world is built. My father is one such person. Today we commemorate—and celebrate—his faith, his love of country, and his life of service.

Today we recall not only my father's accomplishments, but the achievements of his generation. It is now 50 years since the end of World War II, a war which tore apart a western civilization. It is 50 years since thousands of young Americans fought and died to defend tyranny. It is 50 years since the effort to rebuild that civilization began with the Nuremberg Trials—truly the trial of the century.

Many recall the stern justice rendered at Nuremberg against those who committed the atrocities of Nazism. But we should also remember that 3 of the accused at Nuremberg were acquitted. In those verdicts of acquittal, as well as in the verdicts of guilt, the United States and her allies helped to reassure the world that justice could, indeed, would prevail over evil and chaos.

After Nuremberg, my father's generation rebuilt Europe and Asia. The Marshall Plan, NATO, the United Nations—these were extraordinary acts of collective sacrifice, vision, and political courage in the face of significant opposition here at home.

In remembering the achievements of that generation, it is fitting that we here today are joined by President Bill Clinton. In 1995, President Clinton has not forgotten the lessons of 1945.

Like my father's generation, Mr. President, you understand that no nation which proclaims the virtue of freedom can ignore the deprivation of others.

Mr. President, you understand that though the Soviet Empire no longer threatens our world, the job of securing the peace is still far from complete.

Over the past 2½ years you have demonstrated over and over and over again the role we must play in the cause of freedom and justice.

Ireland, Haiti, the Middle East, Asia, Latin America, and most recently, in Bosnia, have profited from our principled, patient insistence that all men and women have a right to shape their own destiny.

At the same time, there remain many parts of the world that still desperately need our engagement and example.

Abroad and at home, you Mr. President, carry within your heart the same wise and generous spirit that guided the generation of my father. You have proven yourself to be a worthy inheritor of their unbending faith in a future where people can live not in fear but with hope. For that, Mr. President, you have earned our everlasting gratitude.

On behalf of the Dodd family, the University of Connecticut, and our Constitution State, we thank you for honoring us with your presence.●

TRIBUTE TO JOHNETTA MARSHALL

● Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, I rise today to pay tribute to a Kentuckian who for many years has displayed a great deal of courage in standing up for what she believes. Louisville native Ms. Johnetta Marshall has traveled the world to fight for the rights of others, and now she's being recognized here at home as the new president of the National Older Women's League, a not-for-profit organization that promotes health, housing, and Social Security issues for women over the age of 50.

Recently, Ms. Marshall traveled to China to march for equality of the sexes at the United Nation's Fourth World Conference of Women. While that trip ended peacefully, some of her journeys have taken a violent turn. One such incident occurred in the Deep South in the late 1950's when Ms. Marshall was pelted with rocks while marching for civil rights. She recently recounted in a story for Louisville's Courier-Journal, that while in Meridian, Mississippi, "we had to go in the back way at hotels and ride the freight elevator. They made us a dining room in the bedroom rather than have us eat with the rest of the guests." While this kind of treatment may have disparaged some, it gave Ms. Marshall a reason to continue her fight for civil rights.

One of the highlights of Ms. Marshall's career came in March of this year, when she was named president of the Older Women's League. Marshall, who served as a member of the board of directors for 6 years, is truly dedicated to the cause and she hopes to put the organization in the public spotlight during her tenure as president. The executive director of the Older Women's League, Deborah Briceland-Betts, says members of the group are delighted that Marshall is now leading them. And they hope she will continue her extraordinary commitment to find creative and effective ways to improve the lives of midlife and older women and their families.

Not only is Ms. Marshall a national leader in the fights for the rights of others, she also worked on behalf of interests in the Bluegrass State. For nearly 20 years, Ms. Marshall was executive director of Louisville's Opportunities Industrialization Centers, Inc., which was responsible for training welfare recipients for jobs. She also served as regional coordinator of the Prichard Committee for Academic Excellence in Lexington, and during that time she worked hard to promote education reform. She was also the director of Senior Services, Inc., executive director of Kentucky's Opportunities Industrialization Center, past president of the Louisville Section of the National Council of Negro Women, and was the first African American woman chair of the March of Dimes' Kentuckiana chapter. And in the 1960's and 1970's, she investigated racism in Ohio, Tennessee, and Kentucky as a member of the Presbyterian Church task force.

As you can tell from her list of accomplishments, Ms. Marshall has had a long and distinguished career, and it does not look like it will slow down anytime soon. Even with the demanding pace of her public advocacy, she still always found time for her real love, her six children whom she successfully raised as a single mother.

Mr. President, I ask my colleagues to join me in paying tribute to this outstanding Kentuckian. I also ask that an article from the October 10 Courier-Journal be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

A PIONEERING SPIRIT—LOUISVILLE NATIVE HAS MARCHED IN THE SOUTH AND IN CHINA FOR RIGHTS OF OTHERS

(By Lawrence Muhammad)

Johnetta Marshall won't tell her age but "pioneer" is definitely a title that fits her.

The Louisville native was pelted with rocks while marching for civil rights in the Deep South in the late 1950s and early '60s. More recently, she marched for sex equality under the watchful eyes of government police at the United Nation's Fourth World Conference of Women in China.

In the '60s, in Meridian, Miss., she recalled, "we had to go in the back way at hotels and ride the freight elevator. They made us a dining room in the bedroom rather than have us eat with the rest of the guests."

Decades later, Marshall attended the China conference as the new president of the Washington, D.C.-based Older Women's League. Carrying a banner and chanting, she and other conferees marched onto the conference grounds and into workshops.

Although no one in her group had trouble with Chinese authorities, she said, "there were people with video cameras. . . . We wanted them to see the banner. But there was no harassment."

Marshall, who lives in Jeffersontown, was named president of the Older Women's League in March. It's a nationwide, not-for-profit organization that promotes health, housing and Social Security issues for women over the age of 50.

The appointment caps a career of distinguished service.

For nearly 20 years until it closed in 1988, Marshall was executive director of Louisville's Opportunities Industrialization Centers Inc., once a nationwide non-profit group with headquarters in Philadelphia that trained welfare recipients for jobs.

She was also the first chairman of the Kentucky Minority AIDS Council.

Sam Robinson, president of the Lincoln Foundation and also a founding member of the AIDS council, recalled suggesting Marshall to the group because of her work with the National Council of Negro Women and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. "And when we were ready to elect officers, everybody looked to her for leadership," Robinson said.

Lead she has, also serving stints as a Presbyterian Church organizer, propagating racial fairness among Southern members during the 1960s and '70s; as director of Senior Services Inc. in Louisville; as past president of the National Council of Negro Women's Louisville section; and as the first African-American woman to chair the March of Dimes' Kentuckiana chapter, among other posts.

Last month in China, Marshall led a 32-member delegation to the Non-governmental Organizations Forum on Women in Huairou. It was an unofficial gathering held in conjunction with the U.N. conference in Beijing.

Marshall and her group, co-sponsored by the American Society on Aging, met officials of the China National Committee on Aging and China Research Center on Aging and toured hospitals and welfare homes for the elderly. It was an effort to promote concerns of older women that past world forums had inadequately addressed, Marshall said.

For example, women over 65 are disproportionately poor, spend more on home repairs, more frequently develop breast cancer and suffer more chronic ailments than older men, according to an Older Women's League study done in 1993.

The study also showed 60 percent of married women are widowed and living alone by 75, and 30 percent require home care, double the percentage for men.

"Back in the civil-rights days, women were suffering, and there have been some improvements, but not enough," Marshall said. "Women can work side by side with men, and maybe have better skills, but men get more pay. And if you happen to be an older woman, you are counted out completely."

Marshall clearly would not be counted out. Leading the local Opportunities Industrialization Center, she smashed the gender barrier in the early 1980s to head the group's executive directors association, a male-dominated network of about 85 OIC insiders.

"For Johnetta to run for that position, and win it, was akin to Shannon Faulkner entering The Citadel," said Gene Blue, president of the Phoenix, Ariz., OIC. "She became a spokes-person who accompanied the founder, Dr. Leon Sullivan, at congressional hearings. She had to overcome significant male egos to preside over all these dudes at meetings and workshops, which usually got loud and emotional."

Blue recalled one particular meeting, where "one of the most vociferous, a senior executive from a major city, had the floor and was waxing eloquent. Finally Johnetta, without even raising her voice, said firmly, 'OK, that's enough. Sit down.' Now, it took most of us by surprise that she would tell this guy to shut up. But she did, and he sat down."

Marshall is widely known as a nurturer too. She grew up in Louisville's Limerick neighborhood, daughter of concrete finisher John Marshall who died when she was 10, and Emma Marshall, who supported the family with domestic work. Marshall had wanted to be a surgeon, but being black and female in the segregated 1930s and '40s, it was difficult to aspire to so lofty a vocation.

A divorcee, she raised six children on her own, has four grandchildren and two great-grandchildren. The fruits of her labors are plentiful among her children: Samuel is a San Francisco stockbroker; Charles, a geriatric doctor in Los Angeles; and John, a supervisor of correctional officers in Los Angeles County. Glenna is a Louisville graphic artist; Marilyn, a bookkeeper in Atlanta; and Jo, a computer systems engineer in Louisville.

Marshall also served as a role model for scores of other people's children at the Presbyterian Community Center at 760 S. Hancock St.

"She'd ask questions like, 'How are you doing at home? How are you doing at school?'" said Ernest "Camp" Edwards, 63, an associate executive presbyter for the Presbytery of Louisville. "I was sort of mischievous, throwing stuff on the floor and blaming somebody else, so she always preached that I should be accountable for my own behavior and not blame others."

"That really stuck with me over the years," Edwards said. "She has a kind of presence and talks to you so that it makes a difference. I'm a social worker by profession, and, because of her, I decided to work with people. She was a 'significant other,' and I decided I could be a significant other."

Charles Hammond, the 52-year-old mayor of Fairfield, Calif., first met Marshall at the community center when he was 14. It was "where we virtually lived after we got out of school, and she was one of our youth directors. They basically kicked our butts and kept us in line. We'd have our dances and she'd give us rules—no cursing, no smoking, treat the ladies like ladies * * * But she always had time for us. There was never a question that went unanswered. And that's what we admired about her. Seven days a week, any time you looked around, there she was, just like our mothers."

JOHNETTA MARSHALL'S ADVICE FOR SINGLE MOMS

Johnetta Marshall successfully raised six children along. Some now have families of their own, and all pursue rewarding careers. "It wasn't easy then," said Marshall, "and even though women have more advantages now, it is lots more difficult."

She offered this advice for today's single mothers: "Recognize that you are only one person, that you can never be a mother and a father. Just be the best role model you can."

"As the mother, you instill in your children some ideals by the way you live. Always be honest and frank with the children. Don't let them think you can give them the moon when you can only give them a piece of the earth."

"And don't give up. You can do it."

NATIONAL SCHOOL LUNCH WEEK

●Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, in honor of National School Lunch Week I want to talk about one of the great public policy success stories of this century—the National School Lunch Program. Passed by Congress and established by President Truman in 1946, this program by law has the mission "to safeguard the health and well-being of the Nation's children." By fighting hunger and promoting good nutrition among children, we can help them grow and mature into healthy, productive adults.

The program has been a resounding success in meeting this mission. Any parent or teacher can tell you that a hungry child cannot learn. More and more scientific evidence has made it clear that hunger and malnutrition can undermine a child's progress in school. Hunger remains a serious problem in this country, and school meals are an important part of the effort to fight it.

Today, the National School Lunch Program serves over 25 million students in 92,000 schools across the country. More than 90 percent of all public schools participate in the program. For almost 50 years, it has provided complete and nourishing meals to children, nearly half of them from low-income families. The school lunch program has reduced malnutrition and improved the health and well-being of children.

Since 1946, we have learned a great deal about the relationship between diet and health. We have learned that it is not enough to provide children with calories. They need the right kinds of food to keep them healthy. Too much fat, saturated fat, cholesterol, and sodium can increase the risk of heart disease and some forms of cancer. Low-income and minority groups are at greatest risk for those problems. Those risks begin in childhood. Good eating habits established in childhood are critical to staying healthy throughout one's life. I am very proud of the bipartisan legislation we passed last year to improve the nutritional content of school meals.

Mr. President, let me sum up by reiterating how important these programs have been, and how important they are today. Just as they were 50 years ago, school meals remain a critical part of this country's effort to promote our most precious resource—the health and well-being of our children. We have worked hard to build a program that is ready to meet its statutory health mission well into the 21st century. As we consider proposals to block-grant or cut these programs, let us not forget how successful they have been in the past and how important it is to maintain them at the Federal level to fulfill our national responsibility to fight hunger and promote good nutrition. ●
