

for title III. The section further provides two forms of suspension authority that the President may exercise to delay litigation under section 302.

First, the President may suspend the effective date for a period of not more than six months if he determines and reports in writing to the appropriate committees of Congress that such suspension is "necessary to the national interests of the United States and will expedite a transition to democracy in Cuba." This suspension may be extended for additional periods of not more than six months each upon making the same determination and report to Congress as above.

Second, after title III takes effect, the President may suspend the right to bring an action under section 302 for a period of not more than six months upon making the same determination and report to Congress as above. This second form of suspension can also be extended for additional periods of not more than six months upon making the same determination and report to Congress as above. Suspension pursuant to this authority will not suspend or otherwise affect pending cases.

The committee of conference provided this suspension authority at the request of the Executive branch in order to afford the President flexibility to respond to unfolding developments in Cuba. The committee specifically rejected a proposal made by the Executive branch that the President be permitted to suspend the right of action upon determining and reporting to the appropriate committees of Congress that such suspension "is important to the national interests of the United States, including expediting a transition to democracy in Cuba."

The committee of conference could not accept the formulation proposed by the Executive branch because it subordinated the question of whether suspension of the right of action would expedite a transition to democracy in Cuba to a larger question of whether suspension is important to the President's overall calculation of the national interest. The committee strongly believes that the question of whether suspension will expedite a transition to democracy in Cuba should be the central element of the President's decision whether to exercise the suspension authority, and not just be one of many factors to be considered by the President.

The formula included in the conference substitute requires the President to determine two separate and distinct matters before suspending the right of action: first that suspension "is necessary to the national interests of the United States," and second that suspension "will expedite a transition to democracy in Cuba."

In the judgment of the committee of conference, under current circumstances the President could not in good faith determine that suspension of the right of action is either "necessary to the national interests of the United States" or "will expedite a transition to democracy in Cuba." In particular, the committee believes that it is demonstrably not the case that suspending the right of action will expedite a transition to democracy in Cuba, inasmuch as suspension would remove a significant deterrent to foreign investment in Cuba, thereby helping prolong Castro's grip on power.

TITLE IV—EXCLUSION OF CERTAIN ALIENS

Section 401 of the House bill provides that the Secretary of State, in consultation with the Attorney General, shall exclude from the United States any alien who the Secretary determines (1) has confiscated or converted, or overseen or directed the confiscation or conversion of, property belonging to a United States national; (2) knowingly and intentionally traffics in confiscated American property after the bill's enactment; (3) is a corporate officer, principal, or controlling shareholder in a company or entity that has been involved in such confiscations or conversions or trafficking; or, (4) is a spouse, minor child, or agent of any person described above. The Secretary of State may waive this prohibition on a case-by-case basis when he determines that it is in the national interest to do so.

The Senate amendment contains no comparable provision.

Section 401 of the conference substitute adopts the approach of the House bill, but limits application of the provision to confiscated property in Cuba. In addition, the substitute limits application of the provision to trafficking that occurs after the date of enactment.

The committee notes that the definition of trafficking for purposes of section 401 is slightly narrower than the definition applicable to title III set forth in section 4(13) of the conference substitute. Two considerations account for the narrower definition. First, the committee did not wish to reach existing acts of trafficking under this section, but rather wished to reach new and different acts of trafficking beginning on or after the date of enactment. Second, the committee did not wish this section to deter investors in Cuba from divesting their holdings. For this reason, the sale or abandonment of confiscated property in Cuba for purposes of disengaging from Cuba is excluded from the definition of trafficking.
