ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

TAX LIMITATION AMENDMENT

Mr. KYL, Mr. President, today is tax freedom day, the day that average Americans can expect to quit working for the Government and begin working for themselves and their families.

Mr. President, it has taken the average American 128 days this year—the 128 days leading up to tax freedom day—to earn enough to pay the tax collectors at the Federal, State, and local levels. Had the average worker devoted every dollar earned every day for the last 128 days, not to food, clothing, or shelter, but exclusively to paying off his tax obligations, it would be only now that his tax bill would have been satisfied and he could begin working for himself.

May 7 is the latest tax freedom day ever—6 days later than it was when President Clinton took office in 1993. In other words, it will take the American people an extra 6 days—nearly a week—to pay for all of the additional taxes that have been imposed during President Clinton's time in office.

Mr. President, it is no wonder that Americans are anxious about their economic security. The harder they work, the more the Government takes. Compared to the 3 percent of income paid in taxes in 1948, the average family now pays nearly 25 percent of its income in taxes to the Federal Government. Add State and local taxes to the mix, and the burden approaches 40 percent.

That is why Congress passed the tax relief bill last year—to begin to roll back the huge tax increase that President Clinton imposed in 1993. We want to see that the American people can earn more, keep more, and do more with their families, their churches and synagogues, and their community.

President Clinton says he wants to help the middle class, too. Why, then, did he veto last year's tax relief bill? Seventy percent of the tax reductions would have gone to those with incomes under $75,000. Looking at the tax relief bill in detail, it included a new deduction for interest on student loans, a $500-per-child tax credit, a tax credit for adoption expenses, and marriage penalty relief. Those four components alone made up 64 percent of the tax relief provided by the legislation. In fact, the Heritage Foundation had estimated that 47,552 low-income taxpayers in Arizona—3.5 million nationwide—would see their entire income tax liability eliminated as a result of the $500-per-child tax credit alone. But President Clinton said no to tax relief.

In fact, the President is still trying to justify his 1993 tax increase as a tax on the wealthy. Tell that to the millions of Americans who are struggling to cope with the soaring price of gasoline made worse by the Clinton gas tax increase. I am sure they would be surprised to learn that they are among the wealthy the President talks about so cavalierly. They are the ones paying the higher gas tax.

Young couples working two jobs and earning a combined total of only $30,000 would be surprised to learn that they are among the wealthy that President Clinton talks about. With two children, they would have saved $1,000 on their taxes if the $500-per-child tax credit became law. President Clinton vetoed that relief.

I am sure the older American who has an income just over $30,000 a year would be surprised to learn that he is one of the wealthy the President is so fond of taxing. He was hit with the Clinton Social Security tax increase in 1993.

According to the Tax Foundation, total Federal taxes on a median-income family—not the rich, but an average family—increased by more than $2,000 during the Clinton years. Just about everyone across the country has felt the ill effects of President Clinton's economic policies.

When the President talks about taxes, it is always in terms of what it means to the Government—can the Government afford tax relief for the middle class? How much more can it squeeze out of working Americans? Well, I think we have to begin to consider how taxes affect working people's budgets. After all, it is Government that is supposed to serve people, not the other way around. A government that confiscates nearly half of its citizens' hard-earned income has, in my
