

centralized source for free credit reports. In fact, I hope the FTC utilizes all of its authority to end the deceptive marketing of free credit reports.

Today, deceptive marketing of “free” credit reports is big business. Ads appear on television, the internet, and other media. One of the leading advertisers of ostensibly free credit reports that are, in fact, linked to paid services is Experian, which vigorously opposed the disclosure requirements in Section 205. Despite its best efforts to sugar-coat its marketing practices, Experian acknowledged that if it were required in its advertising to inform potential customers of their legal right to get a no-strings-attached free credit report, it would have a harder time selling a “free” credit report that also requires consumers to sign up for credit monitoring at $15 per month.

Experian spends tens of millions of dollars advertising FreeCreditReport.com, dwarfing government efforts to publicize the availability of free credit reports at AnnualCreditReport.com and effectively undermining the intent of the free credit report provision of the FACT Act. So it is no surprise that Experian defended its marketing practices with aggressive lobbying. I am confident that the FTC will stand up to that kind of pressure and issue strong pro-consumer regulations by the February 2010 deadline in the law.

If, however, the FTC has not issued final rules by the statutory deadline, Section 205 requires an interim disclosure, “Free credit reports are available under Federal law at: AnnualCreditReport.com,” to be included in any advertisement for free credit reports in any medium. That interim disclosure is intended to be required in all ads from February 2010, until the FTC rulemaking is finalized.

As chairman of the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, I have spent the last 4 years working to expose industry-wide credit card abuses. In 2007, my subcommittee held hearings which brought before the Senate not only consumers victimized by unfair practices, but also the credit card CEOs who approved those practices. In many cases, the card issuers that engaged in these practices relied upon information in a credit report.

Section 205 of the Credit CARD Act will help prevent the subversion of a key consumer protection. Again, I thank my colleagues for enacting Section 205 into law.

REMEMBERING TIANANMEN SQUARE

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, today marks a somber anniversary. Twenty years ago today, months of peaceful protests throughout China culminated with the violent deaths of hundreds, if not thousands, of Chinese citizens advocating for democratic reforms. It is with sadness that we mark this occasion, but it is also an opportunity to renew our call for political reform in the People’s Republic of China.

One of the first things you see when you walk into my office is a large poster depicting the iconic image of a lone man staring down a line of Chinese tanks. This image has come to symbolize the worldwide struggle for democracy, the rule of law, and the promotion of basic human rights. Unfortunately, a generation of students in China can’t identify the image or tell you about the events leading up to June 3 and 4, 1989. This is because China has failed to acknowledge or account for the actions that led up to this event.

While the intervening years since the tragedy have seen China grow into a rapidly developing country, economically intertwined with the rest of the world, China’s failure to deal with the Tiananmen events prevents the nation from making the political reforms necessary to truly become a respected member of the international community.

In the years following Tiananmen, leaders of the Communist Party of China including Jiang Zemin, declared, “If we had not taken absolute measures at the time, we would not have the stability we enjoy today. A bad thing has turned out to be good.” General Chi Haotian, the General in charge of the People’s Liberation Army’s response to the protest later stated that, “I can tell you in a responsible and serious manner that at that time not a single person lost his life in Tiananmen Square.” Leaders of the military crackdown such as Deng Xiaoping and Li Peng, have never been held accountable for the actions of the People’s Liberation Army and there has never been an official acknowledgement of the number of protesters killed or put in prison. Some accounts have claimed that more than 20,000 people were arbitrarily arrested and held without trial. A number of these people remain in prison today.

Today would have been a landmark occasion for the Chinese government to announce that they were starting an independent and open investigation relating to the events of June 4, 1989. However, other than checkpoints set up in Tiananmen Square and efforts by the Chinese government to prevent international media outlets from filming in the square, there are no signs that today is anything other than an ordinary day in China.

While the events of 20 years ago by the Chinese government launched a coordinated effort to prevent further unrest, it also helped crystallize a movement that continues today. Democracy advocates in China have built upon the legacy of Tiananmen and have led various efforts to force accountability and political reforms. All who watch China applaud the tireless work of Ding Zilin, the leader of Tiananmen Mothers, Liu Xiaobo and the rest of Charter 08, as well as countless others such as Jiang Qisheng who continue to face intimidattion and imprisonment, yet persist with their cause.

They can rest assured that ultimately their efforts will be successful. Today’s world is increasingly interconnected. Communication and travel have gotten easier, and with the development of the internet, despite censorship efforts, information is becoming more readily available to the Chinese people. Every day it becomes more difficult for the Chinese government to keep its people in the dark. They will find out about Tiananmen, they will find out about how the outside world operates, they will demand changes at home.

SRI LANKA

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, the recent defeat of Sri Lanka’s Tamil Tigers, otherwise known as the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, or LTTE, is a very welcome development. Led by a reclusive, cult-like figure who apparently saw no evil in forcibly recruiting and brainwashing young children to become suicide bombers, the LTTE long ago forfeited any legitimate claim to representing the interests of the Tamil population. This resounding victory offers the possibility—after 30 long years of conflict, including ruthless acts of terrorism by the LTTE and other atrocities against civilians by both sides—of lasting peace for all inhabitants of that small island nation.

I first became interested in Sri Lanka when a good friend, James Spain, was the U.S. Ambassador there. He often told me of the beauty of the country and its people, and it has been painful to observe the suffering that has befallen them. That suffering was further exacerbated by the tsunami which crashed ashore in December 2004, causing immense destruction and loss of life. A member of my staff was in Sri Lanka at that time, but far enough inland to escape harm.

I have strongly supported humanitarian aid for Sri Lanka, and 2 years ago, as chairman of the State and Foreign Operations Subcommittee, I included additional funding for economic development in the north eastern region of the island after the LTTE were forced to retreat from that area. I look forward to being able to support additional reconstruction aid, so the northern communities that have been trapped in poverty and devastated by the conflict can recover. But for that to occur, several things need to happen.

The war claimed the lives of tens of thousands of Sri Lankan soldiers, LTTE combatants, and civilians. The tremendous loss and grief suffered by the families of both sides needs to be acknowledged in order for reconciliation to occur.

The government should immediately account for all persons detained in the conflict. It should provide access by international humanitarian organizations and the media to affected areas
