

privacy rights and civil liberties as well as an essential part of our national security strategy. When we worked to create this Board in the wake of the Nation's response to the terrorist attacks on September 11, 2001, we did so to ensure that our fundamental rights and liberties would be preserved as government takes steps to better secure our Nation. In the digital age, we must do more to protect our Nation from cyber attacks. But we must do so in a way that protects privacy and respects our fundamental freedoms.

Protecting national security and protecting Americans' fundamental rights are not in conflict. We can—and must—do both. The Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board should help ensure that we do now that the Senate has finally been allowed to act on the nomination of Chairman Medine.

With that, I yield the floor and suggest the absence of a quorum.

UNANIMOUS CONSENT REQUEST—
H. CON. RES. 25

Mrs. MURRAY. Madam President, I just wish to talk for a moment. I have heard a lot from my constituents that they are very tired of the dysfunction in Washington, DC. They are tired of political gridlock that impacts their businesses, their children's schools, and their paychecks. After spending last week with families and businesses that are impacted by sequestration in my home State of Washington, I know this is especially true right now.

When I became chair of the Senate Budget Committee, I said I hoped Democrats and Republicans would be able to work together to end the cycle of governing from crisis to crisis and the attempts to negotiate budget policy through brinkmanship, which we have seen far too much of in recent years.

I believe this goal is just as important today—and is, in fact, more attainable—but we need Republicans to meet us at the table and proceed to conference under regular order.

We are at a unique moment in our debate about the country's fiscal and economic challenges. Following the 2 years that the bipartisan Budget Control Act took the place of a congressional budget, the Senate returned to regular order this year and we passed a budget resolution. The House has also passed their budget, and the President weighed in with a proposal for his path going forward.

We now have an opportunity to move through regular order to try to get a bipartisan budget agreement, and we should seize it.

Democrats and Republicans have different perspectives on a wide variety of issues. But just a few months ago, it seemed that Democrats and Republicans did agree on at least one thing: the budget debate should proceed through regular order.

Democrats chose to move forward with a budget resolution through committee and said that an open process through regular order was the best way to reach a bipartisan agreement. And Republicans agreed. They said once the Senate and the House passed budgets “the work of confereing must begin.” They said a conference was—and I quote—the “best vehicle” for the budget debate “because we're doing it in plain sight.” They said we needed the open public debate that regular order requires.

In fact, Senator MCCONNELL said Senate Democrats should “return to regular order and transparency in the legislative process.” The Obama administration has also said regular order is the way to proceed. But Senate Republicans have now blocked our efforts to move to conference, not once but twice.

Some Republicans said they want to negotiate a “framework” behind closed doors before going to conference. But that is what a budget is; it is a framework that lays out our values and our priorities and helps us plan for the country's future. I think that framework is exactly what we ought to be debating in a formal and public conference, and there is no reason to wait.

Now, I know this is not going to be easy. There are vast differences between the Senate and House budgets and the visions we each present. But I believe we will be most effective at resolving these differences if we have time for open debate and discussion and opportunities to identify common ground.

Waiting until the last minute is not a good option. The uncertainty that is caused in the lead-up to every manufactured crisis over the past 2 years has hurt our businesses, it has hurt our economy, and it is threatening our fragile economic recovery. It keeps us from planning and investing in our future, and it makes Americans question whether their government is capable of solving any problems that confront us.

I know—and we all know—there are extreme elements in our political system that think “compromise” is a dirty word. I know some Republicans think they do not have the political space to make a bipartisan deal until the very last minute of a crisis. But I believe many of our colleagues on both sides of the aisle want to return to regular order and move us away from the constant crises.

I am hoping the voices of reason win because American families and our businesses expect us to do better than running down the clock.

So I urge my Republican colleagues to join us now in proceeding to conference through regular order, as they have said we should. That is the best way to reach a deal that is the best and most responsible path for our country to move forward on.
